In seeking for the cause which so strongly bound these two men together in spite of the obvious dissimilarity which existed, it may be found in that absolute and perfect personal integrity which so clearly marked the conduct of each. And if the late Vice-President had no other claim to the respect and admiration of the age in which he lived, it would shed a halo of glory around his name in all time to come to have it said of him with truth that, having served State and nation for more than a quarter of a century, he died poor. The statement of the fact is its own commentary. Amid the license of civil war; with public conscience blunted; when cupidity was excited by opportunity; when unmeasured wealth might have been and often was wrung from the very necessities of a stricken land without challenge and without reproof, he, leading a life of almost Spartan simplicity, stainless and pure, died, as he had lived, an honest man.

There was, sir, something very touching and sad in the manner of his death. It did not come to him unheralded. Long before the final stroke the warning messenger was by his side, and for months it followed him silently as a shadow, relentlessly as fate! Ever afterward he went about the land deeply solicitous for the common welfare, bearing messages of fraternal love, of peace, of good-will to all of every section. Walking daily in the very presence of death, envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness found no home in his breast; and as he ever prayed for mercy and forgiveness, so too would he have extended these rich blessings to every one everywhere.

Weeks before the meeting of Congress in December, he came here in restless anxiety to complete the work which is to be the record of his life and times. And here, in his chamber of state, in high serenity, sustained by his faith and willing to be judged by his motives and works, he received the final summons, and, gathering his robes about him, he fell asleep under the shadow of the Dome of the Capitol. It was a fitting place for him to die. Wifeless, childless—the light had gone out from his own house; all was dreary darkness there—and coming to this the home of the nation he entered it as of right by virtue of his great office, and from its portal passed away forever, to find his last home in the bosom of the State he had loved and served so well, deplored and respected by the people.

Full of years and laden with honors, the most extravagant political dreams of his youth and manhood more than verified; with but one possible ambition unsatisfied—who may say he was not fortunate in his death?

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, the representative men of a great historical era are passing rapidly from this sphere of their duties. One by one, while the country proudly recognizes in them the souvenirs of its latest glory, they sink beneath that tide which overflows all mortal distinction. Lincoln, Winter Davis, and Chase, Fessenden, Grimes, and Sumner, leaders in the forefront of the late gigantic battle between hostile ideas, had already passed from among us before reaching the usual limit of human life. Again unwilling to wait for the ripeness of age, death has summoned another of the historic company to join his old associates in the land beyond the sun. Heaven seems to have grown avaricious, to seize so soon, and in the very vigor of his years, another living star from the visible coronet of the Republic. We complain that the divine sickle could not wait for all this human harvest until the whitened and bending heads should incline with the weight of years toward the earth which was destined to receive them.

When HENRY WILSON, Vice-President of the United States, received his summons, his form was still round and erect, his eyes beaming with sympathetic intelligence, his hearing open to every sound, his complexion fresh; his voice retained its earnest tones, his mind its vigor, and his heart its patriotism. The ears of his countrymen in all parts of the Union were still listening to his counsel, while their understandings were informed by his practical wisdom. We justly pronounce his departure from public life a national loss. It is the occasion of grief to kindred, to neighbors, to friends, to associates, and to patriots. Kindred and neighbors about his humble home on that eastern coast of Massachusetts to which his dust was committed, remember and celebrate his kindly private virtues and affections. There remain to us who have been his comrades in stormy times the recollection and celebration of those loftier public qualities, which bore him from such lowly beginnings to his exalted office, and which won for him the large influence which he wielded at the time of his death.

Sir, the two extreme forms of human government, despotism and democracy, touch each other at various points in spirit and in action. Both are willful, full of force, and delight in surprises, alternating in action between selfishness and generosity. Despotism sometimes surrounds itself with the splendors of high birth and the culture of learning and the refinements of the arts and civilization; and again, indulges itself with the overthrow of all inherited rights and all claims of distinction, and elevates, instead, some unheralded and unknown servants, some Daniel or Joseph, from the humblest ranks to the governing places of the state.

So the limited democracy of America has indulged its will at one time in elevating the well-bred dignity and worth of Washington and of Adams, the polished culture of Jefferson, and the well-trained logic of Madison. Again, it has taken the ruder strength of Jackson, and the soldierly simplicity of Taylor. Later still, with an awakened conscience, it chose a great-hearted, undisciplined child of the people, and sent Lincoln suddenly to the ruling place. Democracy in him manifested a grandeur of character which was much sooner comprehended by the earnest hearts of the common people, at home and abroad, than by the more cultivated intellects of the world, who have since hastened to crown his unclassic brow with the laurel of history. It was in this era, when our republican democracy was listening to its new-found conscience, that it nurtured, watched, and developed another of its unheralded children, amid the trials of poverty and the struggles for even an incomplete education.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that it is not too early to claim for the late Vice-President the impartial and unimpassioned judgment of the citizens of all parts of the restored Union. In the decade which has elapsed since the fires of civil war were extinguished, the inflamed minds of men have also become more cool and dispassionate. Certainly a thoroughly restored balance of judgment cannot be regained suddenly, on the morrow of such a conflict. When we remember how many years the passions were growing, how at last they ripened into blood, how many sacrifices were endured on both sides before the fever departed and the wounded nation rose to its feet once more, we find cause for congratulation that the balance is so far redressed as we find it to-day. For thirty years it was a contest of opposing ideas respecting the proper constitutional organization of American society. These ideas were the invisible combatants, which finally incarnated themselves for fight and waged their warfare till the earth trembled under their clashing. In the intellectual struggle Mr. WILSON early engaged, and on the side of that small minority which seemed at the time to be a mere faction, hopeless of the confidence of even a single State. When that faction grew into a party, and the party increased to a majority, and the majority obtained control of the State, then, in 1855, the liberty-loving artisan replaced in the United States Senate that polished scholar and orator whom Massachusetts found unequal to the demand of the coming crisis. In that body, and in its high debates, he was to be compared or contrasted, by friend and foe, with such distinguished associates as Cass and Seward, Chase and Douglas, Sumner and Mason, Crittenden and Slidell, with whom he was to discuss the most vital questions of the Union.

abandoned that bench for the forum of public debate, he had small store of learning, but a great sympathy for all his brethren—the children of labor. The field of his knowledge did not include the courses of the planets, the discoveries of science, the rules of art, nor the philosophy of antiquity, nor even the history of older nations. But his mind, with remarkable vigor, grasped and comprehended the wants of his race on this continent. His knowledge of American needs was at first more the result of a sympathetic experience than of careful study. He never separated himself, nor sought to separate himself, from the ground of his early experiences. That ground was hard fact. Throughout his career he dealt with facts. The genius of his childhood endowed him with no gifts of imagination or of artistic invention, and the wings of culture were wanting to his fancy. He could neither soar to the zenith, nor descend to the nadir; but always moved along the line of the visible horizon. There was no fever in his speech. Its most vigorous pulsations manifested only the glow of great earnestness. Without soaring, the movement of his eloquence was a strong stride, every footfall of which struck the solid ground and gave vigor to the next step. His whole political landscape was marked by solid metes and bounds. In the realm of American facts he was king, and in this realm he was rarely, if ever, worsted in debate. Untrained in the law, he was not much given to theories of constitutional construction, but was thoroughly imbued with the spirit of that charter of American liberty. Wherever there might seem to be a conflict of its provisions, its grand guarantees of the rights of persons were vastly more important, in his judgment, than its guarantees of the rights of property. He interpreted it always as illuminated by the diviner light of the Declaration of Independence.

If ever his rhetoric touched the borders of enthusiasm, if ever he seemed to have drank at some spring of oratorical inspiration, it was when he asserted the right of labor to freedom, and the right of freemen to labor without degradation. Then, filled with reminiscences of his own early struggles, and expanding them to take in the trials of millions like himself, and remembering those aspirations which gilded the dark clouds of his laborious youth, he kindled a flame in the hearts of his toiling countrymen which was not destined to die. It was the harp of universal humanity whose chords he struck; and such music once heard is never forgotten. It sounds and resounds from one home and hamlet of the toiling millions to another, and its echoes will never cease till the divine edict for the earning of bread shall be revoked.

Hear him for a moment in the Senate Chamber, in those tempestuous times when labor was clamoring to be released from the degrading thraldom of personal slavery. A Senator from South Carolina had just called the manual laborers of the North "hirelings," "essentially slaves," "galled by their degradation," and the "mud-sills" of society. HENRY WILSON, impatient and glowing, takes up the word as if all the hills of New England were ready to burst with resenting speech. He said:

* * * * * * *

This language of scorn and contempt is addressed to Senators who were not nursed by a slave; whose lot it was to toil with their own hands; to eat bread earned, not by the sweat of another's brow but by their own. Sir, I am the son of a hireling manual laborer, who, with the frosts of seventy winters on his brow, lives by daily labor. I, too, have been a hireling manual laborer. Poverty cast its dark and chilling shadow over the home of my childhood; and want was there, an unbidden guest. At the age of ten years, to aid him who gave me being in keeping the gaunt specter from the hearth of the mother who bore me, I left the home of my boyhood and went to earn my bread by daily labor. Many a weary mile have I traveled "To beg a brother of the earth

To give me leave to toil."

Sir, I have toiled as a "hireling laborer" in the field and the workshop, and I tell the Senator from South Carolina that I never "felt galled by" my "degradation." No, sir; never. * * * I was conscious of my manhood. I was the peer of my employer. * * * I knew, too, that the world was before me; that its wealth, its garnered treasures of knowledge, its honors, the coveted prizes of life, were within the grasp of a brave heart and a tireless hand; and I accepted the responsibilities of my position, all unconscious that I was a "slave." * * * In every position of private and public life are our associates who were but yesterday "hireling laborers," "mud-sills," "slaves." In every department of human effort are noble men who sprang from our ranks—men whose good deeds will be felt and will live in the grateful memories of men when the stones reared by the hands of affection to their honored names shall crumble into dust. Our eyes glisten and our hearts throb over the bright, glowing, and radiant pages of our history that record the deeds of patriotism of the sons of New England who sprang from our ranks and wore the badges of toil. While the names of Benjamin Franklin, Roger Sherman, Nathanael Greene, and Paul Revere live on the brighest pages of our history, the mechanics of Massachusetts and New England will never want illustrious examples to incite them to noble aspirations and noble deeds.

So spoke this champion of free labor. The same sentiment expressed by the rhymes of Robert Burns has echoed over two continents, and still warms the hearts of all the English-speaking races. Sir, had this splendid assertion of indignant manhood come down to us on some venerable parchment which preserved the sayings of Greek or Roman orators, our high-bred youth would echo it in all our schools and universities as belonging to the most vigorous days of ancient civilization. It would have ranked with the protest of St. Paul when he asserted his rights as a Roman citizen and appealed to Cæsar for their recognition, as WILSON appealed to the Senate and to the Republic. No prouder, manlier utterance was ever heard on the floor of the Senate or from a tribune of the people. It presents the inner life, better than any words of my invention, of him whose funeral-rites we celebrate.

Of all the speeches of this eminent man of the people known to me, this, from which I borrow an extract, in reply to the challenge, imported from the drawing-room into the politics of that day, and flung into the face of free labor, is the most characteristic, as it was, perhaps, the most effective. Its wide circulation in our valley of the Mississippi roused strong emotion in the breast and nerved the arm of toil. It was in 1858 that the worth of free labor was thus vindicated in the preliminary war of the conflicting ideas of our social organization. Two years later free white labor vindicated its own dignity by electing one of its own children to the first place of national honor, and again a few years later, having destroyed the adverse system, it elevated another of its family, its champion and the author of this speech, to the second place of national dignity.

Mr. Speaker, often in reading the history of nations we are surprised and awed by some striking evidence of divine intervention in the adjustment of human affairs. The wealthy, the wise, the mighty, overtaken by some improbable event, disappear from the stage, and their places are filled by those who had been the scorned or oppressed victims of their power; and the result was not foreseen of human contrivance. But in no country, except in France, have the events of any quarter of a century of modern history been more surprising and dramatic than in ours. That political philosophy and thorough-bred intellect which prevailed here and rendered the chambers of this Capitol illustrious thirty years ago have passed from this theater with much of the wisdom of that epoch which made them illustrious. Political theorists and theories, doctrinaires and their doctrines, though crystallized in solemn resolutions, dedicated to the names of powerful states, and drawn by mighty political logicians, have gone down before an enemy which never sleeps and always advances. The rights of humanity, the ideas of its progress, have gradually conquered or swept away all obstructions in the way of its organized march, and we have begun a new era which demands extraordinary foresight and vigilant care. It is a halt in the march of our destiny, while the new order is established. We are in the double peril of reaction and of rash action.

The counsel of the man we mourn to-day would have been beyond price during this halting decade of American politics and society. He was one of the few living links between the public life of twenty years ago and that of the passing day. His mental comprehension of the country, both of its interests and of its sentiments; his unimpassioned judgment; his conciliatory regard for all citizens of the restored Republic; his greater love of peace than of violence; his sincere patriotism—all these were qualities which gave him a rare endowment of utility for our times. As I review his career, so early and so constantly and so admirably devoted to liberty and to the state, it seems that he must have been gifted at birth with the sentiment which Pericles uttered in his oration at the celebration of the funeral rites in Athens. Said the Greek orator to the Athenians, "You must constantly keep before your eyes the powers of the state, and must love them. Look for happiness in liberty, and for liberty in your own courage."

Mr. Speaker, if the Congress of the United States were to direct an inscription upon marble to portray in the fewest and fittest words the essential sentiment of HENRY WILSON'S career, they would borrow it from Pericles, and would cut deep in the hard rock the words: "He constantly kept before his eyes the powers of the state, and he loved them. He sought for happiness in liberty, and for liberty in his own courage."

[Mr. BANKS addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, not long since the sad intelligence was flashed from one end of the country to the other that HENRY WILSON, late Vice-President of the United States, was dead. This sad news carried a pang of sorrow and grief to the heart of every lover of his country and to every friend of liberty and justice. I shall not attempt to do justice to the memory of this great and good man. I shall refer more especially to his achievements as a public man—as a representative man.

Mr. WILSON was known and recognized throughout the civilized world as a man of acknowledged ability and admitted capacity. The period in which he lived was one that enabled him to make for himself a record that is in every respect worthy of emulation. He was a man of broad, liberal, and conservative views upon public questions. As was said of Henry Clay, it can also be said of HENRY WILSON:

His sympathies embraced all; the African slave, the creole of Spanish America, the children of renovated classic Greece—all families of men, without respect to color or clime—found in his expanded bosom and comprehensive intellect a friend of their elevation and amelioration. Such ambition as that is God's implantation in the human heart for raising the down-trodden nations of the earth, and fitting them for regenerated existence in politics, in morals, and religion.

In the person of HENRY WILSON the poor have lost a true and consistent friend, the oppressed an able advocate, and the country a faithful public servant. He dedicated his entire life to the cause of liberty, justice, and equal rights. He regarded the institution of slavery as a foul blot upon our system of government, our civilization, and our Christianity. Recognizing the fact as he did, that the tree of liberty had been planted upon American soil and watered with the precious blood of thousands of patriotic advocates of freedom, that we could not consistently tolerate and sustain an institution that was more aggravating and disgraceful than that of which the founders of our Government complained, and against which they were justified in rebelling, he did not entertain any feeling of ill-will toward those who did not agree with him in his views, nor toward those who were personally interested in perpetuating the existence of that institution which he regarded as a national disgrace, and to the destruction and abolition of which he devoted a long, useful, and successful life. But he was actuated by higher, nobler, and purer motives. He regarded the toleration of an institution which recognized the right of property in man as not only destructive of our system of government, subversive of true democracy, and as having a tendency to demoralize society, disturb the labor of the country, corrupt the morals of the masses, and retard the progress, happiness, and material prosperity of the people, but he also regarded it as contrary to the laws of Deity and at war with true Christian civilization. Throughout his useful and eventful life he never failed to raise his voice, to use his pen, and to cast his vote in the defense of those principles which he so consistently and persistently advocated. For his labors in the cause of humanity and justice the name of HENRY WILSON will be gratefully remembered by generations yet unborn.

During the memorable contest of 1856 over the admission of Kansas as a State in the Union, with the friends of freedom upon one side and the advocates of slavery upon the other, HENRY WILSON was one of the few members of the United States Senate at that time who took a bold, independent, outspoken position in favor of freedom for the slave. He did not oppose slavery simply from a stand-point of political expediency, but because he believed it to be morally and religiously wrong, as will appear from the following quotation from one of his great speeches that was delivered when the Kansas question was before the Senate:

> This question of slavery in America is the grand central idea of the country and of this age. If Senators imagine that anything that can be done in this or the other House of Congress, at this session or at any session, is to make peace in this country between the great contending powers of freedom upon the one side and slavery upon the other, they are greatly mistaken; they do not comprehend the vastness and extent of the issues.

> When we adopted the Constitution of the United States we were not responsible for slavery anywhere. If I had time, I could pass on from 1789 up to this time and show you act after act, under almost every administration, in which you have connected us with and made us responsible for slavery. This legislation has been in violation of the policy adopted by the framers of the Constitution and the men who inaugurated this Government. Go back and undo this; disconnect us from slavery; put no responsibility on us; and then our consciences and our judgments will be clear. If slavery is wrong, as I believe it to be—and I believe it to be a crime against man and a sin toward God, and I believe that to be the sentiment of the free States—it is not our crime, it is not our sin.

HENRY WILSON was an ardent and devoted lover of his country. As chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs during the late war he displayed such remarkable ability as to make his power and influence felt, acknowledged, and respected throughout the country. His advice and counsel were often sought by the Government, and seldom if ever rejected. His admonitions and remonstrances were seldom disregarded but often heeded, and never disrespected. He was justly looked upon by the country as one of the chief pillars of the Government during that important period of our country's history. His able speeches, his patriotic utterances, his statesman-like declarations, had the effect of giving renewed life and vigor to the cause of the Union and of strengthening the Union soldiers upon the field of battle. The Union soldier knew that in the person of HENRY WILSON he had a true friend, an able advocate, and a strong defender.

Since the beginning of reconstruction HENRY WILSON has occupied a very conspicuous position. He was among the first to advocate the adoption of a broad, liberal, and comprehensive system of reconstruction. I well remember his pathetic appeals to the old-line whigs of Virginia, shortly after the adoption of the congressional plan of reconstruction, to join with the newly enfranchised element of the grand old Commonwealth in rehabilitating their State government upon a firm, lasting, and solid foundation. He appealed to them to lay aside their passions and prejudices of race, the existence of which is known and generally admitted to be the result of the toleration of slavery and not from natural causes, and join in with this new element that had been incorporated in the body politic of the Commonwealth in reconstructing their State government upon a basis that would prevent a repetition of previous mistakes. His advice to the old-line whigs of Virginia was no less applicable to the same element in every one of the States similarly situated. It is doubtless a source of serious regret to thousands of those he addressed that his advice was not accepted by them. They now recognize the fact that his object was to prevent the formation of parties upon the race issue. He could foresee the disastrous results that would follow a bitter political contest between antagonistic elements, whether it be based upon race, religion, or nationality. He could foresee that, if reconstruction was made an accomplished fact upon the basis of antagonism between the two great elements of which southern society is composed, passion and prejudice would take the place of reason and argument, and that the material interests of the people, the development of the resources of the country, and the cultivation of friendly relations between the sections would be made subordinate to the ambition of unscrupulous politicians. The results that have followed the rejection of Mr. WILSON'S advice by those to whom it was given have very clearly demonstrated the wisdom of his position. The serious apprehensions entertained by him as to the disastrous results that would be likely to follow the adoption of any other course have been unfortunately realized to an extent that is almost irreparable. It cannot be denied by those who are at all familiar with southern politics that the present unfortunate condition of affairs in that section of our country is due more to the existence of this antagonism between the two great elements in the South than to the faults and shortcomings of local, temporary, and periodical administrations. I believe there are but few who will not agree with me in asserting that had the views of HENRY WILSON been accepted and generally acquiesced in, the Southern States would be in a prosperous and flourishing condition to-day.

During the last two or three years of Mr. WILSON'S life he saw proper to advance a few ideas upon what may be called the southern question which subjected him to a little unfavorable criticism on the part of a few of those who are identified with the same political organization of which he was a distinguished leader; but they evidently did not understand his purposes nor appreciate his motives. Those who knew HENRY WILSON, who have carefully watched his career since the beginning of reconstruction, could see in his recent utterances upon that subject the same consistent determination to bring about, if possible, a union of the best elements from the two great masses of which southern society is composed. They could see the same manifestations of an extreme anxiety on his part to bring about harmony and a reciprocity of feeling between the two races in the South, which all must admit is the most effectual if not the only remedy for the evils complained of in southern politics.

HENRY WILSON was a conscientious public man and a true Christian. His character for honesty and integrity could never be questioned. His public career, though long and eventful, was one that was particularly free from everything that was impure or even suspicious. His example is one that is in every particular worthy of emulation. The only thing that is consoling in the death of this great and good man is the fact that he left behind him a glorious record, and that, having lived the life of a pure and devoted Christian, he was enabled to say, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that we may live the life that WILSON lived, and die the death he died.

Mr. HURLBUT. I shall not undertake, Mr. Speaker, to touch the details of the life of HENRY WILSON, to delineate his character, nor to do more than refer to his eminent public service. That will be better done by men who stood nearer to him in his life, more competent to analyze the secret springs of his success, and the real value of his work. I prefer to deal rather on this occasion with the general effect which the man himself has produced upon the thoughtful people who knew him only by the broad and general features of character as these framed and molded his public course and career.

There are two names which go straight to the heart of that grand mass of thinkers and workers who constitute the American people. Abraham Lincoln and HENRY WILSON more than all others of our time command the sympathy and hold the love of the people of the Union; both children of adversity, both toilers from their infancy, both winning their way by dint of brain-work and the dominion of pure character to the high places of the Republic. Differing in many essential qualities, contrasted in many elements of power—alike in the capacity of thorough conviction and of unfaltering action in the straight line of such conviction—each colored and pervaded by the peculiar atmosphere of their special surroundings, both fearlessly, intensely, absolutely American, such men could only be reared in one country; such men could only have come to the front in one epoch of that country.

HENRY WILSON by the force of patient labor, of solid will, of fearless belief, of effort to know the right and to do the right, clove asunder the icy barriers which society had placed between the New Hampshire boy and the Massachusetts Senator. He had the heroism to stand by the unpopular if he believed he stood by the true—a heroism nearly as rare now as it was then—and he had the rare satisfaction in his own life-time of seeing the right thing pass from opprobrium and opposition to success and accomplishment.

From his early days he abhorred slavery as deserving curse from God and man, and he struck straight at the heart of the hoary iniquity enthroned on the prejudice of customs and buttressed though it was by unholy alliance of church and state. His clear moral vision was clouded by no cunningly wrought veil; no device, no subterfuge, no cheat in word or action, could dim the anatomic eye which detected and exposed the loathsome lines that indicated disease and death in the painted harlot who queened it over the fairest portion of the Republic. The strict constructionists of that day, North and South, denounced him. Pilate and Herod struck hands, but the brave heart, strong from continuous struggle, flinched in no wise from the task self-imposed and self-sustained. He lived to see the dead carcass of the great wrong buried forever out of the sight of men, and the once blackened bosom of the nation pure again from that ancient sin. He lived to do his part, as a man should, in the physical struggle, the trial of colossal forces that shook our broad territory and made its earth-fast foundations tremble with the step of uncounted hosts. He saw the authority of the Constitution and the supremacy of law vindicated; he saw those who rashly took the sword punished by the sword; he heard the sounding hammer-blows of a hundred battles, as in the white heat of the rebellion they welded the nation into indissoluble unity. He heard the glorious sentiment of his great predecessor, "The Union, now and forever, one and inseparable," pronounced as the grand result of the tremendous conflict, and wrought into the life and conscience of millions of his countrymen as the one, primal, controlling fact before which all others were dwarfed into insignificance. Filled himself with the largest view of this intense nationality, he rejoiced that it filled the heart of the nation.

As Senator, as chairman of the Military Committee, he did much valuable work, work which the country hardly appreciates yet; and it stands to his eternal credit that in the exercise of the wide discretion and vast power held by him in that capacity no sordid nor selfish nor sectional preference ever impaired the justice of his action.

He took his part fairly and well in all the legislation which followed the war; nor have I ever heard any man say that in anything done or said by him in all that time there was personal bitterness or desire for revenge.

He was active as a politician, for he believed in the necessity of vigorous and enlightened political action. He made enemies, as all strong men do; but even this time in which we live, prolific in slander and prompt to accuse, never charged HENRY WILSON with dishonest act or impure motive.

Not standing in the rank of our greatest men, measured by intellectual standards, his influence was due more to faith in his personal character, his devotion to right, than to pre-eminent mental stature.

He did the work set before him to do with the same good faith and the same steady energy with which he filled out the coarser tasks of his early manhood, and the people for whom he labored so long and well heartily unite in the plaudits of "good and faithful servant," as they look back upon his long career of public service and feel that it is well with any people when from its institutions and modes of life and thought can spring such a life and such a character as that of HENRY WILSON.

Mr. REAGAN. Some days ago it was suggested that I should take a part in the addresses on this occasion. I had then, on account of the pressure of other duties, reluctantly to decline to do so. Until I saw the list to-day of those who were to make addresses I did not know that it was anticipated I should say anything on this occasion, and what I do say shall be limited to stating an incident illustrative of the character and virtues and the charity of the great man whose memory is this day being honored.

My first personal acquaintance with Mr. WILSON was in 1857, and our associations were such as might spring up between two men of different ages and different positions, and differing in politics. At the close of the war I was made, with others, a prisoner, and was taken, with Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, now a member of this House, to Fort Warren. In the fall of the year 1865, when we were released, I immediately returned to the city of New York, and while spending a few days there I met with Mr. WILSON, who was then engaged in canvassing the State of New York. We had a somewhat free conversation about the condition in which the country then was, and especially about the condition of that section of the country in which I lived. A short time before that, feeling that I comprehended the condition of the country and what would be necessary for the future, not only of the southern portion but of all of it, I had addressed a communication to the people of Texas from my prison, urging them to accept promptly the inevitable results of the war as the shortest and surest way to bring to an end the evils which had sprung from it, advising them not only to recognize the freedom of the slaves, but to secure to them the protection of the law and to concede to them the qualified right of suffrage. This had been published, and had come back and been read by Senator WILSON. It became the subject of conversation. He asked my opinion as to whether the people of Texas and the South would accept the policy indicated in that communication. I had to tell him that I could only express the hope they might do so; that for more than four years I had not been in the State in which I lived or mingled with the people of that State. He then said—and I repeat it now because it is in accordance with what others, his personal friends and acquaintances, say of his character; for I would not if it were different from that speak of what was merely a private conversation—he then said he felt it was a duty I owed to Texas and the South, as well as the rest of the country, to return home and urge the people to adopt the policy which I had suggested. He said to me at the same time that if the people of Texas and of the South generally would for themselves adopt that policy he would accept it as a final basis of adjustment of the remaining differences between the North and the South, and would urge its adoption in the Senate of the United States, with the exception that he would ask that the cases of one or two hundred of the leading men should stand over, and that in addition to that which I had suggested he would urge, if they saw proper to take that course, that all except this one or two hundred he referred to should be at once relieved from all liability on account of having participated in the war.

In the condition in which I was then placed, with the feelings I then experienced, remembering that I was returning to a desolated country and a conquered people to mingle again with them, looking abroad and seeing the passions which the war had aroused, remembering the earnest, active part which that distinguished Senator had taken on the one side while he knew that I had been as earnestly engaged on the other, I could not but feel that there was something of a grand magnanimity in his conduct, something of kindness and of generosity in his expressions, which met with an earnest and sincere response from me.

I may say one other thing. He then informed me that while Mr. Stephens and myself were in prison at Fort Warren he had come from his home in Massachusetts twice to Washington to secure our release, not on account of any application which had been made to him by us for that kindness, but because he felt that there was no necessity for retaining us there; for he did not feel any spirit of revenge, and, as was disclosed in the conversation we then had, he felt, as his great colaborer Horace Greeley had felt, that it was not his desire in freeing the slaves of the South to make slaves of those who had been free in the South. He did not wish to see the passions of the war protracted, and urged as a reason why I should endeavor to secure in the portion of the country where I lived the policy I had indicated that the adoption of such a policy was the only thing that could avert military government there, the consequences that would spring from it, and dangers which might result to the Union from having to control large sections of the country by military authority.

Mr. Speaker, words so spoken to one situated as I was it will be understood would make an impression which has gone with me from then till now. After my return home, when my friends in Texas who desired to be relieved at Washington, and who had no acquaintance here, applied to me to see if there was some person here who would take an interest in their behalf, I did not hesitate on more than one occasion to write to Senator WILSON on their behalf, and I never wrote to him without getting a prompt and kindly answer, indicating a desire to do what he could for the interests of our people. Whatever differences in politics may have existed in the past, and however divergent our views may have been on great questions; however earnestly we may have struggled on opposite sides in the days in which we had opposed each other, expressions like these and kindness like this made me feel that these were the expressions and the kindness of a sincere and just heart, and it makes me feel sincere gratification that I have the privilege of saying so in this presence on this occasion.

I am not qualified by association or information to dwell upon the historic features of his character, nor is it necessary that I should do so if I were, after the eloquent portraitures of his character which have been made upon this floor to-day. I did not rise to make an address. I only rose to speak of these incidents, and to speak of them as having made me feel a sincere respect for him while living, and feeling that his death, occurring when it did, was a misfortune to our common country. A year ago, sir, when Mr. WILSON was making a tour through the Southern States, the people of Texas in large numbers, and with whom I united, urgently invited him to come to Texas to enable us to testify our feeling of respect for his generous and manly conduct toward us in the hour of our calamity and misfortune.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, again a dark shadow covers the Capitol and veils its lofty Dome in gloom. Relentless death has again entered the Senate House, and with remorseless fury struck down the chief.

HENRY WILSON is dead. His last work has been performed, his last duty discharged, and he has gone to his reward.

To-day a nation mourns its loss and bows in grief at its bereavement; from Champlain to the Gulf; from Faneuil Hall to the golden shores, the Republic is shrouded in mourning, and its mighty heart ceases for a moment its pulsations while humanity places the chaplet upon the tomb of the philanthropist, the patriot statesman, and the Christian.

O, what a wealth of sorrow; what a majesty of woe!

Among the millions who gather in sorrow around his open grave to pay the last sad tribute to his memory come the brave and patriotic people of my own State and claim a near approach to that sacred spot.

Vermont comes to-day to add one more leaf to the garland that decorates his tomb.

Outside the limits of the noble Commonwealth in which repose his ashes—a State so rich in historical events, in clustering memories, in great names, and in noble men—there is no spot in the broad universe where he was more loved and respected and where his memory is more honored and revered than in the State I have the honor in part to represent.

His name is as familiar as those of her own sons in every cottage and cabin that nestles among her green hills.

It seemed to me that it would be eminently proper that the descendants of Slade and Harrington, pioneers in the cause of civil liberty, should come to the humble tomb at Natick as near mourners of the illustrious dead.

The doctrine of human freedom and the political equality of all men before the law is as firmly and deeply rooted in the hearts of her people to-day as it was on the morning when Allen was doomed to an immortality of fame and Stark drove the mercenaries of King George, routed and bleeding, from the plains of Bennington.

The whole pathway of history sparkles with the names of illustrious men and the noble deeds of heroes and patriots; but it was reserved to the nineteenth century to furnish the most remarkable body of men that has ever existed in the world's annals.

Garrison, and Sumner, and Hale, and Lovejoy, and Giddings, with whom were associated Slade, and Nicholson, and Fletcher, and Shaffter, and Marsh of my own State, were among the leaders and heroes of the old anti-slavery party—a party which embodied the very essence and spirit of integrity, perseverance, independence, honest convictions, high and exalted moral courage, and genuine public virtue. With these men HENRY WILSON was early enlisted in the great work of emancipation and enfranchisement, to which he devoted every energy of body and mind during his whole life. He espoused this unpopular cause when it required physical as well as moral courage to do it.

With Collamer and Foot he bore the heat and burdens of the day; with them he bore the vexation and ignominy of a temporary defeat, and with them at last rejoiced in a complete and glorious victory. And the last public act of his life was an eloquent and stirring address to Vermont's survivors of the great conflict, rejoicing with them in its grand results and imparting words of encouragement and precepts of wisdom by which to shape the present and guide them in the future.

New Hampshire may claim the honor of his birthplace, Massachusetts his home and last resting-place, but his untarnished fame and the history of his noble life cannot be circumscribed by State lines. It is the nation's legacy and the rich heritage of the Republic.

The period of Mr. WILSON'S life was in some respects the golden age of our country's history. It was a time which called for men of iron nerve, of settled conscientious convictions, and manly independence.

It was a time which demanded men who were not afraid to do right regardless of the consequences; who were willing to bear the taunts, sneers, and persecutions of the champions of an accursed institution intrenched behind power, wealth, learning, influence, and religious bigotry.

Such a man was found in HENRY WILSON; a man fortunate in his origin and useful life, and equally fortunate in the time and place of his death.

In early life he was the child of poverty and domestic sorrow; he was cast out upon the cold charities of the world and left upon his own resources; he labored and struggled, buffeting the world's adverse fortunes and storms with a strong arm and an honest heart, strong in his own conscious rectitude, and in God's own good time was ushered at once into the public arena, to combat with intellectual gladiatorial champions scarcely excelled in the world's history.

Manfully he bore himself in the great struggle, battling for the right against wealth, arrogance, and power. Disdaining the codes and dogmas of honor, falsely so called, he planted himself upon the eternal principles of self-defense and personal preservation until victory crowned his efforts and the voice of his country called him to the second position in the nation.

Mr. WILSON'S industry was untiring and knew no bounds. He allowed himself neither recreation nor repose, but, amid all the vast and multiplied labors of his official position, devoted himself with unfaltering courage to the second great work of his life, the gathering up and preserving the facts and fragments relating to the rise and fall of the slave power in America, in order that some future Bancroft may write the history of that gigantic struggle and glorious victory. The work he performed was immense, and a just and generous posterity will award him the meed of praise which is justly and honestly his due for his invaluable services in the cause of justice and equal rights.

Of his long and honorable career in the National Legislature I need not speak; it is a part of the history of our country, and the world knows it by heart.

His Herculean labors at the head of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs during the war for the supremacy of the Government is beyond description, and can be fully known only by those who were his associates in anxious solicitude and toil.

The great Lincoln leaned upon him in the dark hours as a firm support, while every pulsation of his heart, during the whole term of his official life, was for the honor and welfare of the Republic, for human freedom, and the emancipation and enfranchisement of the oppressed.

Among the foremost of the patriot band to whom, under God, we are indebted for universal liberty, peace, and a redeemed and re-united country, stood HENRY WILSON. He never flinched or faltered; when the hearts of the timid quaked with fear he was always hopeful and courageous; when others doubted and turned back he stood firm as a rock in midocean until the storm had spent its fury and peace again brooded over the face of the great deep.

When grim-visaged war had smoothed his wrinkled front, and the dark clouds which had lowered upon our country were in the deep bosom of the ocean buried, he was among the first to counsel forgiveness and brotherly love; and no man rejoiced more than he did in the era of good feeling inaugurated at Lexington and Concord, Ticonderoga and Bunker Hill, at the late centennial celebration; and he looked forward with a longing anxiety and joyous delight to the great exposition at Philadelphia, in 1876, when he hoped to witness the final burial of the last sad relic of the great civil strife, and the principles it had forever settled, and which he had helped so much to crystallize and establish, should be honestly and in good faith accepted by all, the rights of all men everywhere respected, and peace and good-fellowship once more reign throughout the whole length and breadth of our favored Republic.

Vice-President WILSON was not, perhaps, great as an orator, a scholar, or a statesman; but he was great in industry, in the power of intense and continued application, in toil, in courage, in assiduous, conscientious devotion to duty.

He was great in honesty and integrity, in his moral courage, and in the faith and practice of Christianity.

He marched, by the power of his own will, his indomitable industry, and his patriotic impulses, from the bench of the shoemaker to the Senate of the United States; from his humble calling at Natick to the responsible duties at Washington. In all his conduct, both public and private, conscience was his constant monitor and guiding star. No hope of earthly reward or preferment could swerve him from the path of duty and no threats could silence his voice or cause him to abate his ardor in the great work to which he had consecrated his life. Amid the storms and tempests of political life, when the loved and honored were suspected and shaken like a reed, he stood proudly forth, pure and undefiled. No stain of corruption ever tarnished the luster of his bright escutcheon and no bribe ever left its plague-spot upon his hand. Surrounded during his official life with the blandishments of power and the fascinations of wealth, he preserved his character, and died comparatively poor. While many of the gifted and mighty were swallowed up in the whirlpool of dissipation and crime, he walked among them with a charmed life, and came out of the furnace with not so much as the smell of fire upon his garments.

Every noble cause and genuine reform found in him an eloquent advocate and an ardent champion. He represented in an eminent degree the noble elements of our American nationality. His life was the natural and generous outgrowth of our free institutions and of our higher and purer civilization. His character and history demonstrate what industry, will, determination, and integrity can accomplish, and show the value and advantage of steady perseverance and continued and honest adherence to conscientious convictions.

He lived to see the great work of his life accomplished: the political equality of all men securely imbedded in the organic law, and the emancipated and enfranchised bondmen standing as the honored representatives of American freemen in both branches of the National Legislature.

If he had ambition, it was an ambition to do right, to advance the welfare of his fellow-men, and be reckoned among the world's benefactors. If he desired position, it was because it would enable him to accomplish more for humanity and render greater service to his country.

His convictions were clear cut and as firm as the granite hills of his native State; he believed in political parties, and loved his own almost to idolatry; but no partisan blindness prevented his seeing its errors and no timid time-serving policy could deter him from pointing them out and demanding their correction.

If he had faults, they were of the negative kind, and were so mixed up with bold and generous deeds that the world could scarce discern them.

It is well that he died under the roof and almost upon the very spot where he had won his earthly laurels and helped to achieve one of the greatest victories recorded upon the pages of human history. With worldly honors thick upon him and the prayers of a grateful and generous nation filling the whole land, his spirit took its flight from the portals of the National Capitol, with the shackles struck from four millions of bondmen, the shining record of a well-spent life, and a vital and living faith in a crucified Savior, to gain him admittance to the golden city. Tender hands and loving hearts were there in the trying hour to smooth his pathway to the tomb and watch the precious sands as they gently ebbed away. And then, as was so beautifully said of another of Massachusetts' illustrious sons:

> With solemn steps and sorrowing hearts, they bore him back to the State he served so faithfully and which loved him so well; and to her soil, precious with the dust of patriotism and of valor, of letters and of art, of statesmanship and of eloquence, they have committed the body of him who is worthy to rest by the side of the noblest and the best of those who, in the century of her history, have made her the model of a free Commonwealth.

His last public utterance was an admonition to those with whom he had acted politically, which they will do well to observe and heed; it was characteristic of the man; it breathed a spirit of patriotic devotion to country and an anxious solicitude for the prosperity and welfare of her people.

And to-day, as we stand around the open grave of him who harbored no malice, but whose love of country and pure and lofty patriotism knew no North, no South, no East, no West, let us bury every feeling of bitterness and sectional animosity; let us pledge ourselves anew to our country and receive a new baptism into her service; let us all rally around the old flag with all its glorious histories and recollections, drawing our inspiration from one living fountain, and, with one heart, one purpose, and one impulse, press on together to a common and glorious destiny.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I pay a brief tribute of respect to the memory of the illustrious dead. It was my good fortune during seven sessions of Congress to board at the same house and sit at the same table with the honored citizen whose demise we now mourn. During all that time, and more, I had the honor to share his friendship. I had many opportunities to know the qualities of head and heart which render his name dear to the people of every land, and which have made it illustrious throughout the world. It is well that we should pause in the work of legislation to express a profound respect for these, to study them as a means of instruction for ourselves, and that we may be inspired with an earnest purpose to profit by the lessons which they teach.

It is one of the advantages of our republican form of government that it gives equal opportunity to all to fill every place of public trust, to render useful services to mankind, and to rise to the highest distinction which private worth and public service and useful and meritorious labors can give. This fact is illustrated in a remarkable degree by the life, character, and services of the deceased, and by the fruits which they have borne. These have been so fully stated, and are so widely known, and are so interwoven with the history of our times, and the great movements of nearly half a century in behalf of humanity, right, and good government, that it is wholly unnecessary for me to speak of them in detail. It is well that these should be studied by young men and all men, that they may know the elements which made the life of HENRY WILSON a grand success. To some of these I may briefly allude. First of all, HENRY WILSON was "the noblest work of God"—an honest man. Without this quality no man can rise to and maintain permanent success. His life illustrated a fact which cannot be too widely known; that "there is no excellence without great labor"—Nil sine magno vita labore dedit mortalibus. Few men ever devoted more hours to industrious study, to patient investigation, to laborious attention to every duty, than did HENRY WILSON. The results of these are before us and mankind, teaching their lessons of usefulness. His official and literary labors were immense. In Congress he was not a great declaimer, but he was a great orator. He spoke ably and strongly for the right. Another characteristic brought its rewards; he always dared to do right, and trust to God and the sober second thought of the people to sustain him.

When oppression and wrong sit in places of power, or for a time control the popular will, men who are not actuated from a sense of duty may bow to the storm. These are dangerous and unsafe men. HENRY WILSON was not of this class. In all he said or did he was guided by the love and fear of God and a purpose to benefit mankind.

In all the relations of life the heart of HENRY WILSON overflowed with kindness and a tender regard for the feelings of all his fellowmen. He was kindly and gentle in his nature; he never turned away unheard the request of the most humble or lowly.

His life and labors prove that his acquirements were extensive and varied, and these he had the natural and educated ability to apply so as to make them bring success, and to enroll his among the "immortal names that were not born to die." He has passed to his reward. More than a nation mourns his loss.

The good he has done will live after him; it is a part of imperishable history in which he bore a useful and conspicuous part. His monument is more durable than brass. It will be seen and known through the endless cycles of eternity.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, it would perhaps become my position best, not having been accustomed to speak on this floor, to refrain from expressing any of the thoughts which are crowding for utterance at the present moment. There is, however, a single view of the life, character, and services of the late Vice-President, already referred to by those who have preceded me, upon which I will dwell for a moment, for I am not willing that the great State I have the honor in part to represent should remain entirely silent on an occasion like this.

When, at so short a period since, that it seems but as yesterday, our Chief Magistrate was stricken down by the hand of an assassin, all the civilized nations of the earth united with us in mourning and sympathy for the great loss we had sustained in the tragic death of our patriot President.

Now that the second officer of the Government has fallen almost as suddenly by the stroke of disease, our grief is scarcely less intense. Such emotions of sorrow arise not solely by reason of the exalted stations from which these truly great men have fallen, but also from a remembrance of the humble origin of each. Each had risen from obscurity and poverty to such exalted station, not by any sudden fortune, but by patient and steady steps of progress. Each furnished an example of that gradual growth in greatness and goodness attainable only under institutions of government like ours. They were eminently the children of the Republic.

Mr. WILSON, amidst all the honors and blandishments of office and place, never lost sight of the obscure condition from which he had risen. He was always full and fervent in sympathy with suffering and intense hatred of wrong. He lived a life of singular purity and of the most unswerving fidelity to his convictions of duty. It was this which endeared him to the masses of the American people and which renders his demise a source of the most profound grief.

Although the grave covers him, and all that was visible to us is forever hidden from our sight, yet, sir, it is not death. The noble example his wonderfully useful life has furnished to the young of every station will long endure, and serve to emulate the rising statesmen of the Republic.

As has been so felicitously written by a Massachusetts poet of the late distinguished colleague of Mr. WILSON in the Senate, so it may also be fitly said of him:

Alike are life and death,
When life in death survives,
And the uninterrupted breath
Inspires a thousand lives.

Were a star quenched on high,
For ages would its light,
Still traveling downward from the sky,
Shine on our mortal sight;

So when a great man dies,
For years beyond our ken
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

Mr. BLAIR. The great men whose forms we have seen and who in their lives have illustrated and vindicated the principles of American liberty and of just government on earth, who preserved them by the great deeds of the war and crystallized the ideas evolved in the debates and battles of this momentous era into enduring forms of constitutional legislation, are rapidly disappearing from the scene.

Among them all, with one pre-eminent exception, whose apotheosis was by martyrdom, there was no man who, by his early and intense convictions; his life-long, zealous, judicious, and unwearied labors; his perennially youthful and steadfast faith in the final triumph of the cause of freedom in the entire land; who, by his resources in disaster, his confidence even in seasons of despair, his wise counsels, his sagacious perception and forecasting of the currents of thought and of the actual condition of the public judgment and of the impulses of the popular heart, accomplished more in his life-time for his country and for mankind, no man who better deserves to be immortalized among the benefactors of humanity, than he whose name dignified even the lofty official appellation of Vice-President of the United States, and whose memory draws sweet tears from the eyes of thousands of his countrymen while over his new-made grave the frozen winds of distant New England are singing their requiem to-day.

HENRY WILSON was a great man, not alone in moral heroism, which was perhaps the strong aspect of his character, not alone because he was ever equally ready with his most inflexible associates to dare and to do all things for his principles; but more especially in this, that he more than most of them knew how to so do and dare that doing and daring might not be in vain. He was a practical statesman. He was great because he knew men and dealt with them as men. He recognized the truth which must ever be applied by those who transmute abstractions into human history and transfer the dreams of the ideal into the concrete utilities of life, that means must be adapted to ends, and that the average motives of a nation must be reached and stimulated in order to accomplish a national result.

The industrial institutions of a people are seldom, unless remotely, affected by purely moral causes. It is only when such forces have taken hold of material interests that men will consent to overturn the existing state, and it was given to HENRY WILSON more clearly than to almost any other of the great men who led the prevailing sentiment of the nation during its last and great transition to comprehend that practical democracy or republicanism is equality in the conditions of toil. His own rugged lot in early life, when he struggled with adverse fate in his native New Hampshire, whose pride in his career and earnest love for the pure life and noble manhood of her son are the sole reason why my voice is lifted in this august presence to-day, enabled him to comprehend how real freedom is something more than mere absence of legal restraint; that the bondage of the colored man was less the consequence of positive law than of those relations and conditions of society of which the positive law itself was an outgrowth and consequence, and not a cause. He comprehended how all laborers, whether of the North or South and of whatever race, were enslaved in a substantial sense by the existence of the institution of slavery anywhere on the national domain, and, whether sanctioned by the laws of the land or otherwise, how impossible it was and is for these opposing tendencies to co-exist permanently under one common government.

He knew, for he was instinctively a statesman, that unless the principle of absolutely free labor should prevail, whatever might be the written law, the opposing principle would wax stronger and stronger until the laboring man every where would be practically enslaved by the custom of the country. It is a great mistake to imagine that all the slavery which existed within the limits of the Union was confined to the colored race and to the Southern States. The poison was in the atmosphere of the continent and all over the country; the white race, too, was in partial bondage, and neither, although greatly enlarged, is absolutely and practically free even to-day. Ignorance is slavery. Mighty prejudices, the fetters of the soul, are still unbroken, and magnificent victories of peace are yet to be won. We have entered upon a new era, wherein the tendencies and prevailing influences point to the ultimate emancipation of all men, to a period wherein every yoke shall be broken and the oppressed shall some time in the millennial future be absolutely free. In this great exigency of our generation, which we hope we have passed fully through in crossing the Jordan of this triumphant transition, it was given to HENRY WILSON to march conspicuously in front of the halting host for many years bearing aloft the standard of equality for all. It was his to rally, as with the bugles of his native hills, the more elevated sentiments of the nation, to largely aid to forge its stray convictions into a solid mass until the moral and material motives and forces of the people overcome all opposition and the broad theory of absolute freedom for all has been established forever as the fundamental working model of the Government. In this great work the war was but an incident, terrible to be sure, but inevitable; past now, thank God, but full sure to return unless its causes are avoided, its fruits garnered, and its conclusions sacredly regarded; and it would methinks increase the joys of the blessed dead to hear the generous tributes to departed worth with which these chastened walls have echoed the eloquent grief of our sunny and beloved South for him who lived and died the true friend of every human being on earth.

Since the termination of the strife no man has labored more strenuously than the late Vice-President, not only to secure the enactment of the decision of arms into proper and enduring forms of constitutional law, but more especially have his broad patriotism and humane sentiments made him indefatigable in his endeavors to secure the full return of reciprocal love between the sections of our country so unfortunately imbittered against each other by the unavoidable animosities of fratricidal war.

Probably no man contributed more than he to the revival of these gentler thoughts and more generous sentiments which are prevailing to-day, and which may God grant us to cultivate more and more until no discordant note shall mar the joy of our centennial year.

HENRY WILSON is dead. His voice is hushed. His great heart is still. His form has vanished. To-morrow the Capitol will put away its badges of mourning, and history alone will know aught more of him on earth forever. But he has left to the patriot, the statesman, and the Christian the lofty example of an unsullied and illustrious life; to the toiling man and woman and child of every race and clime, and of all ages to come, an inspiration; to his native and to his adopted State, and to the whole country which he loved so well, the memory of a character most rare and exalted, a character which under the adverse conditions of his origin our precious institutions alone could have made possible; and as time rolls away his fame will grow brighter and rise higher in the firmament of history until it shines perpetually, a fixed star in the resplendent galaxy of the greatest and best of his generation.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted, and the House (at five minutes to five p. m.) adjourned.

By Mr. YOUNG: Papers relating to the claims of James G. Moore, Martha M. Parker, Mary A. Somerville, W. B. Hamlin, and Benjamin Coleman, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, papers relating to the application of Gill & Able, for a return of shipping fees, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ——: A paper relative to the complaint J. C. Smith, Dundee, Scotland, from Henry A. Smythe, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the same committee.

By Mr. ——: The petition of William and James Vance, for pay for barracks at San Antonio, to the same committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 22, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. MONEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1343) to relieve S. J. Gholson, of Mississippi, of his political disabilities.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.)

ESTIMATES SUBMITTED FROM THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimons consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1344) directing the method of annual estimates of expenditures to be submitted from the Navy Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making any appropriation for the support and subsistence of the Sioux Indians, parties to the treaty of April 29, 1868, contingent upon said Indians and the several tribes thereof agreeing before said appropriation shall be available to remain and reside on the permanent reservation established for said tribes by said treaty of April 29, 1868, and to relinquish all rights to have any country outside of the limits of said reservation regarded as unceded Indian territory, and the right to hunt outside the boundaries of said reservation; also the right to have white men excluded from the Black Hills country, (so called,) situated between the north and south forks of the Cheyenne River, in the Territories of Wyoming and Dakota.

REFORM SCHOOL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILLARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1345) revising and amending the various acts establishing and relating to the Reform School in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH VARIOUS NATIONS.

Mr. WADDELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the House of Representatives any correspondence which may have occurred within the past year between the Government of the United States and any European government besides Spain in relation to the island of Cuba.

WILLIAM F. BOOR.

Mr. WALLING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1346) for the relief of William F. Boor, second lieutenant of Company A, Twenty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOLMAN. After that I shall call for the regular order.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it is desirable that a thorough investigation should be made by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice into the affairs of that Department, and the size of that committee as at present constituted renders it inadequate to the satisfactory performance of such labor: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the number of said committee be increased from five to the number of nine for the present session.

A MEMBER. That changes the rules.

Mr. CAULFIELD. We do not propose to change the rules. We simply ask that the committee may be enlarged for the present session.

The SPEAKER. That changes the rules.

Mr. HOAR. As this matter has come up now, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House that it shall be the practice, where members ask unanimous consent to submit resolutions for immediate consideration, that they shall be first read for information. It will save a great deal of time, I am sure, and if the Chair will adopt that practice I think the House will unanimously agree to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is not understood to be the rule of the House now, it seems to me it would be better that it should be so understood, that objections shall not be required to be interposed until after the proposition has been read and has come before the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The rule should be that objections shall not be out of order after the resolution has been read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that to be the rule now. Is a point of order made against this resolution, that it shall first be referred for consideration to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I would prefer that it should not go to the Committee on Rules, but be adopted at once.

No objection being made, the resolution was adopted.

SAINT LOUIS NATIONAL RAILROAD CONVENTION.

The SPEAKER. On day before yesterday a committee appointed by the recent Saint Louis National Railroad Convention presented to the Speaker a copy of the proceedings of that convention, with the request that it should be laid before the House for proper reference, without being printed. If no objection be made, the Chair will now present the paper and direct its reference to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock. The first business n order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports f a public nature.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee of Claims have had referred to them sundry matters which they have examined, and find that they have been improperly referred to them. I am directed by the committee to report the same back, and ask that the Committee of Claims be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

They are as follows:

The petition of Charles Baskerville and Henry B. Whitfield, to compensate them for valuable services rendered the Government of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 489) for the relief of the heirs of James W. Eastwood, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 895) for the relief of Joseph Tagg, of Memphis, Tennessee; and

A bill (H. R. No. 896) for the relief of Ann E. Connell, executrix of the estate of Hiram D. Connell, deceased, of Memphis, Tennessee.

The motion of Mr. BRIGHT was agreed to.

Mr. GOODIN. There were referred to the Committee on Public Lands a preamble and resolutions adopted by the Kansas State Horticultural Society on the subject of grasshopper ravages in the several States. I am instructed by that committee to report the same back, ask that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. The Committee on Military Affairs have instructed me to report back House bill No. 162, for the relief of the surviving partners of Shrewsbury, Slemmens & Co., and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress, except the twenty-second joint rule, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAGBY. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I ask leave to report sundry bills for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The call now proceeding is for reports of a public nature. When this call has been concluded, the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

WIDOW OF J. A. FLETCHER.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee on Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to the widow of J. A. Fletcher, late an employé of the House, a sum equal to his pay for three months, and his proper funeral expenses.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports of a public nature having been concluded, the Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAGBY.]

HATTIE D. M'KAIN.

Mr. BAGBY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1347) granting a pension to Hattie D. McKain; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

RUTH ISABELLA NAYLOR.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1348) granting a pension to Ruth Isabella Naylor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

PATRICK GLACKIN.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 31) granting a pension to Patrick Glackin; which was referred to the Committee of the whole on the Private Calendar.

HENRY SCHNETBERG.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 216) granting a pension to Henry Schnetberg, of Indiana, Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JOHN G. PARR.

Mr. RUSK, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

G. W. LA POINTE.

Mr. RUSK also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 995) granting a pension to G. W. La Pointe; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ELIZABETH A. NEIBLING.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that motion is put I desire to submit again a proposition in regard to limiting debate. I suggest that after the first hour the speeches be limited to fifteen minutes. It is quite manifest, Mr. Speaker, that unless this limitation be adopted the House will either have to insist on the five-minute rule or else a very few gentlemen can be heard, or else this debate will go on without limit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks that before the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the centennial bill it be ordered that debate therein on that bill shall hereafter be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will that order affect my time? I obtained the floor when the committee last had the bill under consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have suggested that this limit apply after the first hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who had the floor when the bill was last under consideration, will not be affected by this order.

Mr. LAPHAM. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana to fix the limit at half an hour instead of fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection to the limitation of fifteen minutes. A great many gentlemen have expressed their desire to be heard, and if half an hour be allowed for each speech, the number of speeches must of course be limited. I trust there will be no objection to the limitation of fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the limit suggested by the gentleman from Indiana will be regarded as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. HOPKINS that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOOD, of New York, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill has already been so fully discussed, discussed with so much of eloquence and ability on both sides, so much time has already been occupied, that I know very well I cannot hope to command the undivided attention of the committee. When this debate commenced I did not intend to say one word upon the subject under discussion; but in view of the vote which I shall give upon this bill, and of the position which I occupied in relation to the several bills heretofore passed by Congress on this subject, it has occurred to me that it is proper I should say something by way of explanation—something to express the views which I entertain on this question.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] presents at the outset an objection to this bill that it is not authorized by the Constitution of the United States. The two questions which are really presented for consideration are therefore, first, whether this bill be authorized by the Constitution; and secondly, if so, whether it be expedient for Congress to pass it. The gentleman from Virginia has very properly admonished us of the danger of centralized power and of violating the provisions of the Constitution. But I beg to correct what I conceive to be an error in the remarks of the distinguished gentleman. He says "it is clear that jealousy of centralizing power was the key-note of our Revolution." It was no such thing. The cause of our Revolution was not a jealousy of centralized power; but it was because we were denied a voice in Parliament; because there was "taxation without representation."

The gentleman tells us that this jealousy of centralizing power was embodied in the Articles of Confederation. It was so embodied, and the result was that the government under them became powerless to secure the interests of the people. It was a total failure. Mr. Hickey, in his work on the Constitution, says:

> The deplorable condition of the finances and credit of the Government under the old form, and the incompetency of the Congress of the Confederation to raise a revenue, support the public cred[illegible], regulate trade or commerce, or to provide for the wants and safety of the country, were among the immediate and prominent causes that led to the abandonment of that inefficient form and the adoption of the present system of Government.

The greatest objection to the articles of confederation was that they gave no power to regulate commerce, no power to hold an international exposition.

The gentleman tells us that this same jealousy of centralizing power was not lost sight of in the Constitution of the United States. Certainly it was not lost sight of; but the greatest dangers which we have encountered under the Constitution have not arisen from any excess of the exercise of power, but because of a denial of the authority of Congress to exercise powers which were necessary to our preservation as a Government, and essential to the promotion of the welfare of the people.

Sir, we were told at the commencement of the rebellion that there was no centralized power to preserve our national existence. The hatred of centralized power was carried to such an extent that we were denied the right to suppress a revolt against the authority of the National Government. But the results of that rebellion demonstrate that this is a government, that it is clothed with the powers necessary for self-preservation; that under the Constitution, by express grants of power, it can enact many measures designed to secure the general welfare of the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I were asked what measures are most demanded to secure the interests of the people of this country, I would say there are three: first, an increase of our commerce with foreign nations and among the States, with a resulting increased demand for labor; second, the funding of our national debt at a lower rate of interest; and third, treaties of friendship and commerce with all nations, which would make it the interest of all to preserve eternal peace and multiply the commercial and other necessities and comforts of man. These I conceive to be the three things demanded more than all others to secure the interest of the people of this country.

When a state or nation adopts as its motto "agriculture, commerce, and manufactures," it is thereby signified that these are interests which are to be fostered by the legislative power with a view to promote the general welfare of the people. The act of Congress of March 3, 1871, which authorizes a centennial exhibition at Philadelphia, evinces a purpose not only to develop and encourage "agriculture, commerce, and manufactures," but all "arts, manufactures, products of the soil and of the mines," to which I would add the forests of the country. And now I proceed to show, as I hope I can, that the pending bill is authorized by the Constitution. In doing this I desire to state a proposition to which I think no gentleman will object, and it is this: If the bill now before the committee will accomplish any purpose as to any or all of these great interests which the Constitution has by an express delegation of power authorized Congress to secure or encourage by law, then it is constitutional. I will proceed therefore first of all to inquire what results this bill will accomplish, and then I will endeavor to show that these are the very results which the Constitution has authorized Congress to aid, promote, and encourage for the general welfare of the people. Indeed we must make this inquiry before we can decide upon the constitutionality of the pending bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is this bill? What is to be done under it? What purpose does it seek to accomplish? The act of March 3, 1871, which will be found in the sixteenth volume of the Statutes at Large, page 203, provides for celebrating the one-hundredth anniversary of American Independence by "holding an international exhibition of American and foreign arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mines in Philadelphia in 1876," open to all the world, and declares that it "shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States." The bill which is now before the committee is necessary to give effect to the act of March 3, 1871. If this bill is not passed, the exposition must be a failure. When the act of 1871 was passed I was opposed to it. I voted against it for reasons which then seemed to me to be sufficient. I am not sure I was correct; but whether I was or not, the questions now are wholly changed. It is no longer a question whether it was wise to have passed it, but whether, having embarked in the business of holding an international exhibition, it is our duty and our interest—whether we have the constitutional power to carry it into effect.

What will be the effect of this bill? What will be the effect of carrying out the object of the original act on this subject? Will it encourage or promote any object which Congress by specific grant of power is authorized to encourage or promote? I will endeavor to show that it will increase the exports of all the products of art, of manufactures, of the soil, and of mines, as well as of our forests; and in return it will multiply the number and quantity of our imports. In other words, sir, it is a bill the object of which is to exhibit to all the foreign nations of the world the products of our skill, our soil, our mines and forests, that they may be induced to buy of us, that thereby our exports and in return our imports may be increased; and thus the commerce of our continent and of the world may be enlarged. The object of the bill is to enable our own people to come together and exhibit all these products, so that they too may increase the trade and commerce between the States.

These will be the results if this bill shall become a law. Will any gentleman on this floor deny it? I have heard no denial by any gentleman who has discussed this bill. Our experience already shows that this will be the result. At the great world's fair at Paris, or what was called the "Paris exposition," the McCormick reaper, manufactured in the city of Chicago, took the first prize. The result was that a demand was made for the McCormick reaper all over Europe. Our export of that particular product of the skill of our artisans was largely increased. A demand grew up abroad for that particular article which vastly increased its export and sale. This, sir, increased the labor employed in this branch of industry. It made a demand for the hard-wood timber and the iron of Ohio. The saw-mills, the iron-furnaces, the railroad companies, all had a new and increased demand upon their resources. The labor of the country found a new demand and a new avenue opened up to it, and the result was beneficial to our whole people, because commerce was largely increased.

At the Paris exposition American sheep—sheep from the State of Vermont, owned by Mr. Campbell of that State—commanded a high premium, and Vermont found a new market for the best specimens of her flocks. The knowledge of the value of these flocks became more general in all or most of our own States, and a new market was opened up which improved and increased the wool product of the country. Woolen manufactures grew up, giving employment to our people and diversifying our agricultured pursuits. This imparted increased value to our lands by multiplying the uses to which they might be applied. All over Ohio the beneficial effect of all this has been felt. In the town where I reside splendid woolen mills furnish a great abundance of manufactured goods of unsurpassed excellence and beauty.

The Paris exposition was a means of advertising our products, advertising them among our own people, advertising them among the nations of the earth. The result was an increased demand at home and abroad, among the States of the Union and throughout the nations of the earth, for all the products of our soil and all the products of our industry.

At the Vienna exposition the Wilson sewing-machine, invented by a citizen of the county in which I reside, took the first premium, and as a result of that it found its way to the markets of the world. Since that time, Mr. Chairman, improvements have been made in all our agricultural implements, in our sewing-machines, and in the products of our industry and the skill of our artisans in a thousand forms. Now the city of Springfield, in my district, manufactures some forms of agricultural implements perhaps more largely than any city of the United States. They are unsurpassed in beauty and excellence by the products of any city of the world. The Champion reaper is now exported from that city to all parts of Europe. The Leffell water-wheel, manufactured in that city, is used in every State and Territory of the American Union. It is used in England and in many of the states of Europe. Its surpassing excellence is widely known. The same city manufactures a sewing-machine known as the "St. John sewing-machine," invented by R. H. St. John, esq., a citizen of the town in which I reside, a friend and constituent of mine; a machine which is said, and I believe correctly, to surpass all previous inventions of that class. And if we shall hold this exposition at Philadelphia these products of that city which I have the honor to represent will be exhibited to the people that will assemble there from every State and Territory of our Union and from states all over the world. What will be the result? The demand for these productions will be increased; our exports will be increased; and in return for what we send abroad our imports will be enlarged. The city of New York, represented in part by the gentleman who now presides over the committee, [Mr. WOOD,] will reap a rich harvest as the result of our centennial exposition.

I might mention other products of this and other cities of my district—the "Miller" carriages and buggies of Bellefontaine, the wagons of Tippecanoe City and Troy, the varied products of the city of Piqua, the locomotives and railroad machinery of Urbana—but time will not permit.

And I only refer to my district to illustrate what in other forms of industry will apply to others.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if leading men can be assembled from all parts of the world to see these products of our skill, a demand abroad will be made for them, and they will go to Europe, to Asia, to Africa, and to the islands of the ocean. So it will be with the ten thousand and more products of our industry. Then what will be the result? What is to be the result of this exposition? It will be, in brief, an increase of our exports, an increase of our imports, an increase of our trade, an increase of our intercourse with foreign nations and among the States. This will benefit the labor of our country; this will benefit the whole people.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. In connection with what the gentleman is saying of the results of these exhibitions, I wish to remark that the Walter A. Wood Mowing-Machine Company, of my district, exhibited their machines at Vienna, and that their exportations since have amounted to scores of thousands of dollars.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Undoubtedly. That was a valuable machine in its day. It is now being largely supplanted by the machines manufactured in my district. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. And they are sustaining more than three hundred laborers and their families by the wages they give.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That is very well. That is no doubt an important branch of industry in the gentleman's district; but the manufacture of a single portion of the Champion reapers in my district supports an establishment I believe giving employment to five hundred laborers. All this proves the necessity of this exposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I leave that branch of the subject. What have I shown? Certainly that this bill will encourage commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

I now address myself to another branch of this inquiry. I pick up a public-debt statement and I find in it that we have a debt stated as follows:

Debt bearing interest in coin:
Bonds at 6 per cent	$1,017,615,400
Bonds at 5 per cent	670,384,750
Bonds at 4½ per cent	.....

Some of this debt is already due; other portions of it will soon come due. It is our policy to refund this debt at a lower rate of interest. I read the condition of the money markets in America and in Europe. I read the reports of the money market in New York, London, Paris, and Hamburg. We know the condition of the money market in Wall street, Threadneedle street, and the Bourse. I find that money cannot be borrowed for the Government in this country on bonds bearing a less rate than 5 per cent. interest, because our capital is not so great as in the older countries of the world. But when I go to Europe I find that England borrows money at 3 per cent. interest. I find the money markets of Europe overflowing with gold seeking investment at 4 per cent. and even less. But capitalists are unwilling to invest in American securities to any large extent or at any fair rate of interest, because they are unacquainted with our resources. They do not know the character of our people. They know we had a tremendous rebellion; they suppose that it is only for the time being suppressed, and that permanent, eternal peace between the States is not restored.

The capitalists of Europe will not buy American bonds at the same rate that they buy European securities. There are two causes for this. They do not believe that fraternity is restored between our States, and they feel that a new rebellion may yet waste our resources. They doubt, or rather they do not know, the extent of our resources, the character of our people, and the high character of our civilization. They know but little of the extent of our varied industries, the wealth which is garnered up in our mountains, which lies spread out upon our great prairies, in our fertile fields, and in our vast forests. We may tell them all this. But this will not satisfy them. We have never had a great national exposition to which they could come and see for themselves.

Mr. Chairman, "seeing is believing." By this exposition we propose to invite the capitalists of the world to come; we ask them to come and see our mountains filled with coal and iron, and gold and silver, and copper and lead, and cinnabar. Here we have mountains filled with silver and gold sufficient to pay the principal and interest of the debts of the whole civilized world. We ask them to come and look at our wide-spread prairies, at our fertile fields, at our vast forests, at our magnificent rivers, at our churches with their spires pointing to heaven, at our magnificent civilization, at the industry of our people, the products of our skill, at our resources in every form. We ask them to come and see our common schools, which are, and we are resolved shall forever continue, nurseries of instruction, religion, and morality for all our children, for these are the agencies which make men who "constitute the state" and perpetuate our Christian civilization. We believe that the result will be that they will be satisfied that fraternity is restored to the people of this country, that the Republic will secure forever internal peace and endure through all time. They will know that we are willing and able to pay our debts. When they have seen all this, we believe that they will then be willing to invest in our bonds at a lower rate of interest than 5, 4½, or even 4 per cent. Our nation will take her place among the nations of the world, her credit revived, and we shall be able to refund our debt at 3 or 3½ per cent. interest. We propose by this exposition to show that we are a united people; we propose to show to the world that we have fraternized, and that there is no danger of our resources being wasted by war any more. To that exposition will come BLAINE and HILL, GARFIELD and TUCKER, BANKS and LAMAR. There I would have HILL repeat that speech of his, that he is "in the Union to stay," and the gentleman from Virginia to repeat again the closing sentences of Webster's immortal oration in which he declared for "liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable;" and then I would have the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] read poetry and scripture to them all. There I would have the Union and confederate generals bring their swords, that they might be beaten into plowshares, and the soldiers of the late contending armies bring their spears, to be converted into pruning-hooks. There, under the shadow of Independence Hall, in the city of Philadelphia, I would hold a grand political love-feast, a meeting for the promotion of perfect political holiness and sanctification. There I would have the people of our own and other lands to look "upon the gorgeous ensign of a Republic now known and honored throughout the nations of the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured."

Mr. Chairman, the result of the exposition upon our national credit will be of great value. It will convince European states of the fraternity, the honesty, the resources of our people; our bonds will find a ready sale in the markets of the world, and at lower rates of interest than now.

Now, sir, I address myself to another feature of this bill, or rather to the results which will flow from it. We desire to make treaties of friendship with all nations. We sometimes desire to make commercial treaties, mutually advantageous to our own and to other nations. This centennial, sir, will furnish to all nations a knowledge of our institutions, of our productions, of the skill of our mechanics and artisans. But a few years ago, sir, the ports of Japan were closed against us. We made a commercial treaty with that country, and the result is that now Colonel Horace Capron, once our Commissioner of Agriculture, is at the head of the agricultural department of Japan. Now we are exporting agricultural implements and all the products of our industry to that country. Our commerce has grown in extent and importance, and the people are reaping the benefit of all this.

Now, instead of sending out expeditions to other countries, we propose that the representatives of all countries shall come to us, and when they have seen what is here, the result will be that we will be enabled to make new commercial treaties, and under this power of the Government to enlarge the commercial interests of this and other countries. We will thereby build up friendly relations with all nations; we will increase trade and make treaties of friendship and commerce a necessity.

When the people of different countries trade extensively with one another they are much more likely to maintain permanently friendly relations than where there is no such trade carried on. The reason is plain. Commerce plants itself in opposition to war between nations, and thus operates as a bond of peace. Peace is necessary to its successful prosecution. There is, then, not only a commercial and pecuniary view of this subject, but a philanthropic and humanitarian aspect in which it may be considered.

Having called attention to the results which the exposition will bring, I proceed to inquire if they are such as the Constitution authorizes Congress to aid or promote or encourage? Does any specific grant of power in the Constitution authorize Congress to promote or encourage an increase of commerce? That is the real question. If so, then this bill is constitutional; if not, then there is no warrant for its passage. Now, what are the specific grants of power to Congress in the Constitution? What are the provisions under which this bill may be justified? The Constitution starts out with this preamble:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Then further on it provides—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

It is also declared that—

The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties.

And then again it is declared that Congress shall have power—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

If, therefore, this bill be "necessary and proper" to "regulate commerce," or to enable the Government "to borrow money," or to make treaties, then it is authorized by the Constitution. But the inquiry arises, How far necessary?

Upon this inquiry I call the attention of the committee first to the character of the necessity which justifies the exercise of the powers conferred upon Congress by the last clause which I have read. Some gentlemen construe that clause as if it read—

Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be absolutely necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.

But the Constitution does not say that; it does not require that the means employed shall be "absolutely necessary."

In the case of the United States vs. Fisher (2 Cranch, page 358) it was held that—

The power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers granted confers on Congress a choice of means, and does not confine it to what is indispensably necessary.

Again, in the celebrated case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, (4 Wheaton, page 416,) it was held that—

If the end be legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, may constitutionally be employed to carry it into effect.

If a certain means to carry into effect any of the previously granted powers be an appropriate measure, not prohibited, the degree of its necessity is a question of legislative discretion, not of judicial cognizance.

In other words, Congress is the sole judge of the necessity of the means employed to carry into effect any one of the powers specifically granted to Congress. Again it was held, in the famous case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (4 Wheaton, page 187,) that—

The limitation on the means which may be used to carry into effect the implied powers is not extended to those expressly conferred.

Here, then, Congress is the sole judge of the necessity and propriety of the means which this bill proposes to employ to "regulate commerce," provided only the means are adapted to the authorized object.

That they are adapted to increase commerce I have shown, and I will hereafter show that to increase commerce by operation of law is to regulate commerce by law.

Now, it seems to be conceded on all hands that if there be what is called a substantive "general welfare" power conferred on Congress by the Constitution this bill is undoubtedly authorized. I do not deem it necessary now to claim that there is any such power. I agree entirely with the interpretation which was given to this clause of the Constitution by Madison and afterward adopted by Justice Story that this clause should be read: "Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." I agree to that; but this does not necessarily exclude the idea of a "general welfare" power as a distinct substantive power. But I do not rely on or deem the assertion of any such power necessary. But I do claim that this clause of the Constitution is declaratory of the purpose for which a specifically granted power may be exercised. Whatever regulation of commerce will promote the general welfare is authorized.

If any law affects commerce so as to promote the general welfare, it is a regulation of commerce which is authorized.

The words "general welfare" were inserted in the preamble to the Constitution and at the head of the specific grants of power to Congress for some purpose. A rule of construction requires us to give effect to them. Every power specifically granted is to be read with the caption and in the connection of the grant of power to levy and collect taxes. Then the power to regulate commerce should be read thus:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes in order to provide for the general welfare.

The Constitution intended the "general welfare" should be kept steadily in view. This purpose is as necessary in regulating commerce as in levying and collecting taxes. The grammatical construction of the words employed authorizes the view I have presented.

In making regulations in regard to commerce, then if Congress makes one which will promote the general welfare, it is authorized by that clause of the Constitution.

I now proceed to show that any law which increases commerce regulates it, and that the power of Congress in this respect is plenary. Look at the words in which the power to regulate is conferred. There are two leading words in it, "regulate" and "commerce." What is commerce? It is trade; but it is something more than trade. It has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United State in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, to which I have referred, and in the case of the United States vs. Holliday, (3 Wallace, 417,) that commerce is trade; but it is something more than trade, it is intercourse.

These, then, are the matters which may be regulated.

Now, what is implied in the power to "regulate?" The power to regulate is a power to make laws affecting commerce. This results from the necessary meaning and force of language. It is simply the logic of our literature. Whatever affects trade regulates trade; whatever affects intercourse regulates intercourse.

This power to regulate is plenary and knows no limit. That, too, was decided in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, and I beg to read a passage from the decision of the court in that case:

This power—

Says Chief Justice Marshall—

like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. * * * If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to the specific objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

For all purposes of the bill under consideration there is no limitation on the power.

This power to regulate commerce, then, is a "plenary power" which knows no limit; is controlled only by the discretion and judgment of Congress as to the means which shall be employed to promote it. A law which increases the commerce of the country regulates that commerce, because it affects it. This power to regulate commerce is a transfer from the States to the National Government of all the powers which the States had upon the subject. Now, I suppose it will not be controverted that the States of this Union, if we had no National Government, could, under their absolute and unlimited legislative power—the power to regulate commerce—hold expositions at their pleasure; and if they would have this power, Congress undoubtedly has the same power. This is the view which has always been taken of the subject. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, section 1080, declares:

The power to regulate commerce, being in its terms unlimited, includes all means appropriate to the end, and all means which have been usually exerted under the power. * * * The main and admitted object of parliamentary regulations of trade with the Colonies was the encouragement of manufactures in Great Britain.

Then he adds, in section 1082:

In commercial and manufacturing nations the power to regulate commerce has embraced practically the encouragement of manufactures.

The second act that was passed by the Congress of the United States contains a preamble in these words:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, &c.

Judge Story says that when this bill was pending "not a solitary voice was raised against it."

I think I have said enough to show that the effect of this exposition will be to increase the commerce of this country with foreign nations and among the States; that the Constitution authorizes any law which will have the effect to encourage and increase commerce; and that therefore this bill is warranted by the Constitution.

This construction of the Constitution is sanctioned by the usuage of Congress under it. I have no time to go into that subject; but that construction is settled by the appropriations which we made for the Paris exposition, for the Vienna exposition, for the entertainment of Lafayette when he visited this country, for the entertainment of Kossuth. It has been settled by the appropriations Congress made to feed the starving poor of Ireland, which was voted for by Calhoun; by the appropriation which Congress made for the starving people of the South; by the appropriation for the relief of the sufferers from the grasshopper plague in Kansas and Nebraska in the last Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the same argument which I have endeavored to make as to the power to regulate commerce applies equally to the power to borrow money and the power to make treaties. We may send agents to Europe; we may send our agents to the syndicate. We have done so without question as to the authority from any source. Nobody doubts that. We may advertise our resources and give information to capitalists of Europe as a means of inviting them to invest their money in our securities. If we can do that, may we not provide an exposition and invite the capitalists of Europe to come and view the products of the country? It is only a means of giving them the desired information, that which is requisite to accomplish the purpose which the Constitution authorizes—"to borrow money."

But I will not further pursue this branch of the inquiry. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is expedient for several reasons. I shall not have time to discuss them fully; I will simply state the reasons which seem to me to justify this bill as a measure of expediency.

First, we are committed to it by the past legislation of Congress.

Second, it will promote the general welfare by encouraging and increasing commerce, trade, intercourse with foreign nations and among the States.

Third, it will make new demands for all the products of our industry, and give employment to our labor.

Fourth, it will aid in restoring prosperity to the people.

Fifth, it will promote good-will among our own people and with foreign nations; and this is worth many times over $1,500,000.

Sixth, it is a measure of economy. It is a good investment; it will come to more than it costs. There is a policy of being "penny wise and pound foolish." We may save $1,500,000 by refusing to make this appropriation; but we may lose $100,000,000 by failing to make it.

Sir, there is an adage that it is not wise to save at the spigot and lose at the bung-hole. I fear a failure to pass this bill would be saving at the spigot and losing at the bung-hole. It will cost three and a half cents per head of our people. It will bring vastly more than that to the industries of the country, because it will increase the demand for all our products, and consequently the demand for labor in every branch of industry throughout our entire Union.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] says he is opposed to a splendid government with an impoverished people. I am in favor of a government which can rise to the dignity of manhood among the nations of the earth, and which can secure a splendid people by taking care of all their interests. Sir, you will have an impoverished people if you deny to Government the powers which are requisite to secure the general welfare by encouraging, increasing, and promoting the commerce of the country. I go for this bill because I do not want an impoverished people. I want to increase the products, the power, and the resources of our people. Let us, then, have a centennial exposition, in order that our people may not be impoverished. Let us cultivate good-will, that our resources may never again be wasted in war.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that we are committed to this measure and cannot honorably refuse to make this appropriation. Let me turn to the acts on this subject to see whether that is not so. The first is the act of March 3, 1871, to which I have already called attention. It declares that this exposition of American and foreign art and manufactures shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States. But that is not all. The act of June 1, 1872, contains a preamble which says that "whereas such provision should be made for securing funds requisite for the purpose aforesaid as will enable the people of the United States, who have shared the common blessings resulting from national independence, to aid in the preparation," &c.; and then it provides for a corporation to secure the necessary funds. But that is not all. Then follows the act of June 5, 1874, to which I invite attention, and which says that:

Whereas, at various international exhibitions held in foreign countries, the United States have been represented in pursuance of invitations given by the governments of those countries and accepted by our own Government: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be requested to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to those governments to be represented and take part in the international exhibition to be held at Philadelphia under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

Under this law foreign nations have been invited. They have accepted the invitation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know these acts contain a disclaimer that Congress shall not be called upon to make any appropriation by reason of anything contained in them. I feel the force of that; but still the palpable fact stands out that Congress has said an exhibition shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States. Suppose the means provided for raising the requisite funds for carrying it on are not secured as contemplated by the laws on the subject, then Congress is obliged to make up the deficiency. If I invite a man to dine with me there is an implied obligation on my part that I will furnish a dinner. It will be no excuse for me to say that my neighbors have agreed to provide the requisite food or that I had made such provision myself as I supposed would furnish the requisite means. If the provision I have made does not result in furnishing the means by which I can entertain the guest whom I have invited to share my hospitality, I am bound by my invitation to see means provided. That is precisely the condition in which the United States now finds itself. It is said in solemn words, in positive laws, that this exhibition shall be held, and that it shall be held "under the auspices of the United States." The promise to hold the exhibition and the invitation extended to foreign nations to participate in it create an implied obligation on the part of the Government that if the means provided fail, then the Government shall pay what is requisite to secure the object promised in the acts which have been already passed.

I am for the exposition because the people demand it. In this very month the governor of Ohio, a democrat, in his last annual message said:

We have now entered upon the centennial year of our national existence. The efforts which have been made to insure a proper celebration of the important event at the city of the nation's birth have been crowned with great success. The principal nations of the world have signified their intention to participate through their representatives at the national capital, and the President of the United States in his recent message has recommended to Congress that it more fully invest it with national significance. The different States of the Union are vying with each other in friendly and patriotic rivalry in the effort to make a creditable exhibition of their growth and resources, and Ohio, the third in population and wealth and the equal of any in its natural resources, should not lack in appreciation of the interesting event or lag in its efforts to make such an exhibition as will give it its proper place in the rank of States. Our efficient board of State centennial managers have been laboring with great energy, and are cheered by the belief that their efforts have been successful in creating an interest which will insure such a representation as will be a matter of pride to every citizen of the State. I respectfully recommend that you grant them such reasonable aid as they may require to complete their arrangements and secure the success of their labors.

His successor in office, Governor Hayes, in his inaugural address said:

Agreeing generally with the sentiments of Governor Allen's recent message, I desire especially to concur in what is said on the subject of the national centennial celebration.

No community in the world has been permitted by Providence to enjoy more largely the blessings conferred on mankind by the great event of 1776 than the people of Ohio. Ohio and her interests had no existence a hundred years ago. They are the growth of less than a century. The people naturally wish that their State and her history and her advantages should be widely known. No other such opportunity for their exhibition will probably occur for several generations.

Mr. Chairman, I am for the exposition. I believe it will promote the interests of this country. It is authorized by the Constitution. I do not at all agree to the doctrine stated by the gentleman from Virginia, that the Constitution was created by the States. It was created by the people. The government under it is a National Government. The people are a nation and we are "one people." The Declaration of Independence states that we are "one people." The States never were sovereign. When we were colonies, dependent upon the Crown of Great Britain, sovereignty resided in Parliament alone. We sought to share in controlling that sovereignty and failed. We then organized a sovereignty of equal power. When we severed the bonds which united us to Great Britain, the Declaration of Independence, by which that was done, was not proclaimed by any State of this Union, but it was by a Continental Congress, representing the people of all the States. That Continental Congress had powers which were supreme, undefined, and unlimited. It made war; it established a national bank; it raised armies; it legislated for the whole country; it acknowledged no limitation upon its power; but when the Continental Congress gave way, then we did have a government under the Articles of Confederation, which was a government of limited powers—so limited indeed, that after a few years of experiment it became manifest it was totally inadequate to accomplish the great purposes of national unity and take care of the interests of the people. And that, in turn, gave way to the Government established under the Constitution of the United States. But this was established by the people, and not by the States. The Constitution itself says that it is made not by the States, but, as its preamble declares—

We, the people of the United States, do ordain this Constitution.

And, sir, that Constitution was not submitted to the States for ratification, but it was submitted to conventions in the several States elected by the people in order that it might be known that it was a constitution ordained by the people and not by the States.

This Government has itself created twenty-four States. They had no share in creating the National Government, yet they occupy the same relation to the National Government as the original States—a condition of subordination as to all matters intrusted to the National Government, which is made the sole judge of its powers.

I regret that gentlemen have seen fit to introduce again this exploded and dangerous doctrine that the Constitution was created by the States. What is the purpose of it? The idea that the Constitution was made by the States, that it is a mere treaty or compact between States, is most pernicious and dangerous. Independent nations make treaties. Each nation judges for itself whether they are violated, and each decides for itself on "the mode and measure of redress." Each has the power to make war to redress a violation of a treaty on such a construction of it as the nation may choose to make. The reason is plain, there is no court to decide which nation is right. Why, sir, underlying this doctrine that the States made the Constitution is the fatal heresy which has brought so much of death and misery to our land. If the Constitution was ordained by the States and not by the people, if it is a mere treaty between independent States, then each has the "right to judge of the mode and measure of redress" when any State may suppose that the compact made by the Constitution has been violated. That means, sir, that any State has the inherent right to secede from the Union and to break it up at pleasure. I had supposed that that question was settled by the results of the late war. It was so settled. Yet gentlemen now on this floor revive the exploded and fatal heresy. The perpetuity of the Union requires that we maintain forever that this is a nation, that our people are one people.

Mr. TEESE. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect in the very few remarks I shall make upon this bill to advance any new argument in its support. The arguments pro and con upon its merits have been exhausted already in this debate. But, as much of the time of this House has been spent this session by gentlemen here in putting themselves or their opponents "upon the record," as it is called, I may be pardoned for saying a word or two by way of explanation of the vote I intend to give.

Much has been said about the constitutionality of this bill. That is a subject upon which one may well entertain doubts. My own mind is not entirely free from them, but, being in doubt, I am willing to throw that doubt in favor of this bill.

This debate has clearly shown one thing to be true, namely, that, whether this bill be constitutional or not, precedents by scores are not wanting to justify appropriations of this nature; and, when either the honor or the reputation of the nation is at stake, I am content to take well-established precedent as a sufficient adjudication to guide my action in the premises. This is the only way questions of this kind ever can be decided. Where is the court that can adjudicate upon the constitutionality of a question like this? Clearly the will of the people, expressed through their representatives in Congress, must, ex necessitate rei, be the supreme law.

Whether this or that measure is right, proper, or constitutional must depend in a great degree upon the merits of the particular case in hand; and, as what the common law of England is depends upon what courts say it is, so the spirit, meaning, and common sense of the Constitution must be determined, in matters not susceptible of adjudication by the Supreme Court, by the Congress of the United States.

Sir, I am not much troubled by constitutional scruples in voting for this bill, but there is, to my mind, a greater difficulty to overcome. I allude to the propriety of now annulling the re-iterated enactments in former bills that "the United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, for any expenses attending the exposition, or by reason of the same." While I shall vote for this bill, I should have less hesitation in doing so if it did not seem to me to violate an implied pledge that no such appropriation as now asked for would be made; and I wish to say that, although enactments of the character referred to are repealable, I think that when a bill is once passed the honor of the nation shall be considered as pledged to strict compliance with its provisions unless some great and unforeseen emergency arises rendering its repeal necessary. I object to making laws made and intended to be repealed; to obtaining the votes of one Congress upon the repeated promises of the friends of a measure, embodied in statute laws, that no money would be asked from the Government, and yet so ingeniously framing those laws that it may be urged in another Congress with great plausibility, as it has been urged in this debate, that it seems inconsistent that an enterprise declared to be undertaken under the auspices of the United States, and in which foreign governments have been officially invited to participate by the President, should nevertheless receive no financial support from the Government.

Yet, notwithstanding this objection, I cannot but recognize the fact that this is a great national, or rather, I should say, an international, exposition, and that it inures not only to the benefit of our common country, but that its tendency is to establish peace and good-will among the nations; and I fully concur in what my colleague [Mr. HARDENBERGH] has said in desiring that the exposition shall be a great national success.

I represent in part a State which has subscribed $100,000 toward this centennial celebration, and an immediate constituency who are largely engaged in manufactures and who are large contributors to the exhibition and deeply interested in its success. I have no doubt that their interests will be greatly subserved by the proposed appropriation. I know their wishes, and I know I would not represent them truthfully if I should vote against this bill. And while I am not thoroughly persuaded of the entire propriety of this appropriation, I am satisfied that there is not in my district any considerable minority opposed to it.

Under these circumstances it becomes my duty, as it is my pleasure, to respect the known wishes and requests of the people who sent me here to represent them, and to vote for the bill.

I give the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES.]

[Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to record my vote in silence against this bill; and in speaking now I have no hope of checking the glow of patriotic fervor which is hurrying this House to pass an act taking $1,500,000 of the hard-earned money of the toiling millions and giving it as a benefaction to the centennial board of finance to enable them to carry out the proposed centennial exhibition on a scale of grandeur commensurate with the greatness of our country. Eloquent appeals are made to our patriotism, glowing descriptions of the imposing character of this exhibition are arrayed before us, well calculated to blind our reason and dazzle our imagination. The shafts of ridicule, tipped with wit and sarcasm, are leveled at the heads of those who invoke the aids of reason and judgment as fitting factors in this discussion. The red man of the distant plains is here summoned to do duty in order to enlighten our understanding, by instituting a comparison between the noble physical proportions of the savage warrior and the lean and meager form of the pacific and unwar-like legislator from the State of New York, [Mr. WILLIS.]

For me to utter a word against this bill, I doubt not, will be attributed either to a want of patriotism or to a spirit of petty economy akin to meanness. But, sir, I feel that I have a duty to perform in voting against this measure elevating my opposition above any charge of indifference to the honor and glory of my country. I yield to none in love and devotion to this my father-land; and may God do so to me and more also if I forget my duty to advance full high the ensigns of her greatness and power until she shall stand peerless and alone the glory and admiration of the world. But no appeals to my patriotic pride and no invocations of ridicule or sarcasm shall blind my eyes to the true road leading to her greatness, glory, and power. It is to be found, sir, in simple republican practices, as far as possible removed from the pomp and circumstance of regal show. It is to be found in the habits of industry, simplicity, and frugality marking the earlier and better days of the Republic. It is to be found in that stern unyielding honesty that will make every man of us swear upon the altar of his country that while she is staggering under the fearful burden of her public debt, that while the business of the country is paralyzed, that while industry is seeking labor in vain, that while the starving are asking bread, not one dollar of the public money confided to our care as a sacred trust shall be spent for any other purpose than meeting our plighted faith, and discharging our solemn obligations.

Ah, sir, I have heard the words "economy" "retrenchment" and "reform" since I have been in this House—words fragrant with dear memories of the past, pregnant with bright hope for the future—repeated a hundred times by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the leader, the Telamonian Ajax on the democratic side of the House. I never saw him rise in his place but I had spelled out the word "economy" written on the winning features of his face. His economic virtues filled me with gratitude and thankfulness that the stern virtues of a Cato had not perished from the earth. In my simplicity I had said, "Lo, I hear the voice of the evangelist of 'economy' in this wilderness of wickedness, given so much to amnesty and appropriations, crying make straight the ways for a return to simplicity, integrity, and economy." But how our fondest idols one by one are shattered! On that face where once I read economy I shall henceforth read the inscription, "Give, O give us an appropriation!" Such sublime evidences of a disposition for retrenchment and reform, provided they have a snug appropriation in them, fairly overwhelm one new to these scenes and who came here believing that professions would be supplemented by practice. But evidently the distinguished gentleman, wise in political lore, has accepted the definition of the great French diplomat, that the true function of speech is to conceal one's thoughts. Let me say, however, to the gentleman and to this House, that the people are in earnest in their demand for economy, retrenchment, and reform, and here and now is the place to begin. Prodigality to-day with the promise of reform to-morrow is a cheat. I would that I had the power to inspire the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] with a psalm-reading disposition to-day. How could I sit at the feet of one wiser in ancient psalmody than Gamaliel, and listen to his reading of some fitting psalm, exhorting to economy, to humility, to the laying aside of pride and ostentation! The occasion and the time would inspire him with that pious fervor and thrilling unction for which my reverend friend has achieved so just an eminence. He might fitly preface it with some text from Paul's epistle to the Ephesians. But, alas! like the venerable Senator Dilworthy, he too, I fear, is for retrenchment and reform with an appropriation in them!

Mr. COX. I do not know on what authority the gentleman classes me with those who are in favor of this bill. I have not spoken anything to the House on the subject in favor of it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I never understood that the gentleman was opposed to it, and most of his friends support it.

Mr. COX. I generally speak for myself on these subjects. The gentleman's oratory is very fine, and I accept as a compliment, but I deny his right to classify me in that way.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. One only of the trinity of reformers and retrenchers is left, the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] Sir, by night as well as by day I had expected to see the white plume of that gentleman waving from the ramparts of the Treasury, and to hear his clarion voice ring out over the din of the assault the challenge of the Scottish chieftain:

> Come one, come all! this rock shall fly
> From its firm base as soon as I.

Where, sir, is he in this fight? Has he, too, fallen before the seductive influences of an appropriation, or does he stand solitary and alone, verifying by his voice and vote that when he pleads for economy he means it? No, I am glad to know he is not among the fallen, but simply comes late into the fight.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that shame, humiliation, and disgrace will befall the nation unless we vote this appropriation. I do not believe it; but if it does, others and not those who oppose this measure have been the efficient instruments in it, by placing the Government in a false position. If her honor is plighted, so that to refuse to vote this money involves dishonor, Congress did not do it.

I am utterly opposed to this Government becoming a partner with the centennial board of finance—a private corporation—as a stockholder in the corporate property. It seems to me that it little befits the dignity of this great Republic to be interested in the entrance-fees charged for admission to that exhibition. I see no honor reflected on our good name when foreign nations learn that we advance this money to become a silent partner, interested when the concern is finally wound up in the division of the profits of the venture. If we make a gift let us make it open, fair, above-board. I want this nation never again to become a partner with any private corporation in any enterprise of a business nature. Neither former experience nor the fitness of the thing is such as to justify further experiments in this direction. I am opposed to this bill because when the subject was first brought before the American Congress it could never have been carried except on the distinct pledge made by its friends and embodied in the law that the United States Government should never be liable for a dollar. This pledge has been repeated in the most solemn and emphatic manner in the subsequent legislation on this subject.

In section 7 of the act of March 3, 1871, it is provided:

> That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States, and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

In the ninth section of the act of June 1, 1872, creating the centennial board of finance, it is provided that—

> Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim by the centennial international exhibition or the corporation hereby created for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debt or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized.

The act of June 5, 1874, authorizing the President in the name of the United States to extend cordial invitations to foreign governments, provides:

> That the United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, for any expenses attending such exposition, or by reason of the same.

And yet, sir, in the face of this solemn declaration, made to the nations of the world when we authorized their invitation, we are told that our honor is pledged to grant an appropriation! Weak indeed must that cause be which seeks to impose such burdens on our credulity!

In the act of March 3, 1875, authorizing the engraving and printing of the certificates of centennial stock, it is provided:

> That this appropriation shall not be construed as in any manner committing the Government of the United States to any other payment whatever to meet the expenses of said exhibition.

Now, sirs, ought these solemn and repeated declarations embodied in the form of law to be ruthlessly violated and stricken down? I appeal to gentlemen who voted for these laws to stand by the record of economy they then made. Surely there has nothing occurred since these solemn assurances were given the people by their representatives which can now justify their repudiation. Nay, on the contrary, the long-continued financial distress, the heavy burden of debt thus made doubly burdensome, the fearful burden of taxation weighing down the productive industries of the people, all cry, as with the voice of an archangel, spare, spare!

But not only the faith due to obligations plighted in the form of law confronts this appropriation, but the oft-repeated and solemn assurances of the distinguished Senators from Pennsylvania as well. When the centennial project was first up for discussion in the Senate, and gentlemen expressed a fear lest an appropriation should be asked, the venerable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] said:

> The money required will be raised without any expense to the Government Philadelphia will take this matter in hand just as any other great city of this country would do.

Again:

> * * * They ask nothing else of the Government than their charter or act of incorporation. * * * There is no doubt they will raise the money. They will to-morrow go to work immediately to procure this money.

The other distinguished Senator [Mr. Scott] was equally distinct in his pledges on this subject. He said:

> When the subject was first introduced in Congress it was feared that an appropriation would be asked. Everybody in both Houses was so sensitive on that question that an express disavowal of all responsibility on the part of the Government had to be incorporated in the act.

Would that there was equal sensibility on this question now! But I have quoted sufficient to prove that Congress, reflecting the public judgment on this question, would do nothing except with an express disavowal of all responsibility on the part of the Government and an equally distinct avowal that the Government should never be asked for a dollar.

I shall not stop to inquire by what authority it is proposed to take $1,500,000 of the people's money and give it to a mammoth corporation. For one, I do not believe in gifts made to any body or to any corporation out of the public Treasury. I am disposed to doubt our right to set ourselves up as donors of the people's money. I think their money was taken from them as taxes to meet and pay the necessary and legitimate expenses of the Government. I think if the people desire to make a gift to the centennial board of finance they are quite competent to do it. For one, I am heartily tired of the policy of diverting money from the Treasury to any other than proper governmental purposes. Here I am determined to take my stand, opposing all gifts, grants, and subsidies from the national Treasury, and, so far as in my power lies, I mean to see to it that no money is appropriated except to redeem our plighted faith and meet the necessary expenses of an economical administration of public affairs. Such, I believe, is the true meaning and spirit of the Constitution I have sworn to support; and I shall, regardless of personal considerations, at all times endeavor to make that great charter of our liberties the pillar of fire to illuminate my pathway through the night and tempest of this House.

But when I am asked to oppose this measure on the ground that the people of the United States do not constitute a nation, a great independent nation, and not a mere confederacy of States—a nation with a national government in the broad international sense of those words—I cannot do it. When I am asked to vote against this appropriation because it is idle to claim that we are a nation and that our Government is national, my whole nature revolts at the monstrous suggestion. I am utterly amazed that the eloquent gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] who depicted in such touching periods the woes of his native State, should so soon appear to forget the cause of those woes. They were caused, sir, by loyal men who marched beneath the flag and kept step to the music of the Union in attempting to demonstrate that the people of the United States do constitute one nation, a great and powerful nation, and one having both the constitutional and physical power to vindicate its right to live. And when a democratic President could find no constitutional authority to coerce a sovereign State the loyal men of America, with a voice as sublime as that which shook the everlasting foundations of Mount Sinai, said: "We are a nation; we have a right to live as a nation; we have a right to coerce a sovereign State that defies our authority; and by the ever-living God we will do it." And they did it. And never, never, sir, as long as the heroic achievements of the unnumbered hosts of the patriotic living and the dead who fought beneath the flag of our nation—our fathers' flag—shall be told in story or in song, will it be idle to assert that we are a nation; that our Government is national. That question, I had thought, was settled by the dread arbitrament of war in that high forum from whose decision lies no appeal. We all remember when the decision of the question of our nationality was transferred from the forum of congressional debate to that higher forum, that court of last resort whose decrees are registered amid the smoke of battle and the clash of arms. Profoundly grateful am I that no republican who votes against this appropriation will do it because he believes that the people of the United States do not constitute a nation as contradistinguished from a confederacy of States. The party to which I have the honor to belong is a national party; a Union party; a party which, knowing no North, no South, no East, no West, stands by the unity and nationality of the Government; denies that we are a mere league, compact, or confederacy of States; and, planting its standards on the ramparts of the Republic, swears that she shall stand as a nation, one and indissoluble, now and forever! The difficulties which I see to making this appropriation are not found in the old State-rights dogmas which I had fondly trusted were safely entombed with the remains of the dead confederacy.

But passing from this question, Mr. Chairman, I trust gentlemen may remember that this centennial exhibition, with its wonderful treasures of art, with the accumulation of all the products of earth and sea, with the rich fruits of the pencil and the chisel, with the grand achievements of the inventive genius of the world, is only for the few. The great body of our countrymen—the great, almost unnumbered millions of the toilers of our land on whose Atlantean shoulders rest the firm foundations of the Republic—cannot be there. I know that every man, woman, and child in all this broad land would gladly visit those scenes hallowed with the fragrant memories of the revolutionary fathers. They cherish those memories as a precious legacy handed down by patriot sire to son. But they cannot be there. They know how with toil and sweat and pinching economy they feed and clothe and educate their little flocks. They ungrudgingly and patriotically pay their full measure into the public Treasury, and they have a right to ask, to insist, that not one dollar of it be spent to give splendor to an exhibition which not they but other people are to enjoy.

But, sir, we are told that the Treasury is only to suffer to the extent of $1,500,000. Ah, gentlemen, I am possessed of some of the fear, I trust not prophetic fear, of the ancient Trojan who opposed the breaching of the walls of Troy to admit the wooden horse! He feared the Greeks even when bringing gifts; I fear my centennial friends oven when asking an appropriation. If they shall make a breach into the Treasury, if they shall get their wooden horse within its walls, I greatly fear that before the session closes we shall find this centennial appropriation, like the wooden horse of old, filled with enemies who will take captive our Treasury. Already bills are pending before the House which, if passed, would add probably not less than $500,000,000 to the debts now pressing us to the very verge of national bankruptcy. Our people are as patriotic, as patient, and long-suffering as any on the face of the earth; but, sir, the everlasting drain of the hard-earned money of the people to meet some high-sounding gift or subsidy ought to be stopped. One million and a half is only the beginning. My conviction is that when we have voted this sum we shall, before this business is closed, be called on for other millions. We must extend, we are told, to the emperors, kings, and princes of other lands a suitable welcome—one befitting so great, so glorious a country as ours. It cost Austria $12,000,000 in gold to hold her exposition, and certainly if we get through with the imposing exhibition which we are expected to hold with $20,000,000 we shall be fortunate indeed. And this appropriation made, we cannot in honor refuse to make another.

For another reason I am opposed to making this appropriation. This is intended to be a national celebration, a jubilee of the people in honor of the natal day of the nation. It ought to be begun, continued, and ended with the free contributions of a patriotic people. It is neither honorable nor creditable to us as a people, if with all our greatness and prosperity in the past, the inspiration arising from the grand memories crowding upon us in the present, and the lofty hopes and anticipations of the future, we cannot make our centennial exhibition a more glorious success by appealing to a patriotic people than we can by taking this money under the forms of law. Rely on the people; let them know your needs; let the voice of some new apostle of liberty, like a Peter the Hermit, ring out over the land fanning into a flame the patriotic fires burning in the breasts of the people; and we will present a grander, a more sublime spectacle to the world than it has yet beheld. The world will then see an exhibition sustained by voluntary contributions—gifts of a free, patriotic, and intelligent people—which in extent and grandeur shall be matchless and unsurpassed. Have faith in the liberality, patriotism, and intelligence of the people, and, without the coercive aid of a paternal government, success shall crown your labors.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as opposition to the appropriation asked for in the bill before the House seems to subject one, in the opinion of some persons, to the suspicion of a want of patriotic devotion or of a spirit of niggardly parsimony, I may be pardoned, sir, for claiming the indulgence of the committee while I state the grounds of my opposition.

Yielding to none in my desire to encourage whatever would tend to heal a divided country, restore thoroughly friendly relations between once warring sections, revive public spirit—the only aliment upon which free institutions subsist and prosper—and promote that harmony and fraternal feeling which the people of every section, as well as most of their Representatives upon this floor, have uppermost in their hearts, I come to the consideration of the proposition with every disposition to do it and its movers justice. Certainly, sir, no prejudice will imbitter my speech or sway my action. The motive which prompts gentlemen to its support, so far as we can collect it from argument and appeal upon this floor, is eminently patriotic and honorable, as lofty as ever impels to human action, no motive being higher than that which seeks to honor and magnify and exalt the Republic. It is indeed fortunate for the country if up to this time no motive less worthy has had a part or lot in the inception and progress of this great enterprise. It will become a subject of national felicitation, when the curtains shall descend upon the vast pageant, to know that in an age when a grasping cupidity, a guilty eagerness for wealth have been rampant on every side, this great affair has been so conducted as that no foul suspicion of jobbery or peculation has rested upon its management to blacken its history and mar its moral grandeur.

I make no charge, much less do I intimate any doubt of the management thus far; but I do say this, Mr. Chairman, that, so important it is to the honor and fame of the country that no reptile vice "shall practice falsehood under the saintly show" of the most exalted of virtues, that cupidity shall not be licensed to don the livery of patriotism and prostitute the noblest instincts of our nature to the basest and most ignoble of purposes, we should hesitate to grant this subsidy until assured by members of this body, properly authorized and accredited to investigate and report upon the management and progress of the work, that good faith and fair and unimpeachable administration of the trust, commensurate with the sublime idea of a centennial celebration of a nation's birthday, have been observed up to this time, and are assured for the future, so far as the samecan be done by human guarantees.

Have we had any such investigation or such report? What committee charged with such duty has visited Philadelphia and made inquiry into all these matters? None, sir, that I am aware of. I leave out of view, sir, the unofficial visit of the Chief Magistrate and many members of the legislative and judicial departments made just before the holidays. That occasion was not suited, nor was it arranged, for any such purpose. It was rather calculated, with all its attendant circumstances, whether so intended or not, to elevate the distinguished guests entertained with such princely hospitality to a plane immeasurably above the meanness of detail necessary, as I conceive, for the intelligent action of this body.

But, Mr. Chairman, I say with perfect frankness that if the history of the enterprise thus far were all that the most exacting jealousy of the nation's honor could ask or expect, I should still be constrained by my convictions of public duty to withhold my support, anxious at the same time to see the enterprise prosper to a complete and triumphant success worthy of the nation whose history it commemorates and of the august visitors whose presence it has invited. We are told that without this subsidy the celebration may be a failure, and the honor of the country is staked upon its success. Well, sir, I do not believe, for one, that it will be a failure though this aid be denied. All other resources failing them, there is still left, as remarked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COCHRANE,] the power to mortgage their property, amounting in value to more than $5,000,000, and also their prospective income, which cannot be stated, but which will certainly be enormous. This the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says they do not wish to do. But it seems to be with them a mere question of taste and propriety; and, declining to do this, they come asking for this subsidy, which three several times Congress has expressly refused: In the act of March 3, 1871, creating the Centennial Commission; in the act of June 1, 1872, creating the board of finance; and in the act of June 5, 1874, authorizing the President to extend invitations to other governments. In all these acts the idea of Government aid or liability is most distinctly negatived and put beyond question.

Mr. Chairman, there is to my mind something strange in the fact that after the President had issued his first proclamation, which recited that the governor of Pennsylvania had given notice that provision had been made for the erection of suitable buildings for an international exhibition, and which proclamation contained an invitation to foreign countries to take part therein—it is strange that after the proclamation of July 3, 1873, it should be deemed necessary to pass the act of June 5, 1874, repeating the invitation. The conclusion is inevitable to my mind that the object and purpose were to commit the Government so that it could not avoid granting what is demanded here to-day. Was the governor of Pennsylvania mistaken in so grave a matter, or was he relying on the success of this device to secure what from the first had been refused—a Government subsidy?

The proviso to the act of June 5, 1874, refusing any appropriation of public money, adopted by a republican House of Representatives, that in a few months afterward received a terrible popular rebuke for its many sins, not the least of which were its extravagance and corruption, is now to be stricken out or set at naught by a democratic House, elected upon a promise of honest, economical, and constitutional government. That promise to a tax-ridden people is to be kept with a faith that would not be honorable to a great party seeking the control of the Government.

No party, sir, can or ought to retain power in this country that does not carry out in unimpeachable faith its pledges to the elective body, and in my humble judgment, speaking with the deference of one of its least experienced members in this body and with all respect for many able gentlemen who advocate this measure, the democratic party of this House will incur a fearful and dangerous responsibility in voting away the revenues of the Government on the heels of an exceptional republican precedent of economy to a purpose of most doubtful constitutionality. I say doubtful constitutionality, recognizing to its fullest extent the difficulty of denying successfully any power to the Federal Government, when confronted with the precedents of the past few years.

While perhaps the era of constitutional politics has reached its decline, as seems but too manifest when we see how at once a constitutional argument palls the public attention, often subjecting the disciple of State rights and constitutional limitation to the ridicule and sarcasm of those whose glistening eyes are fastened upon the public treasures, it will be a sad day for the Republic when the doctrine shall be gengenerally received and admitted that there is no limitation upon the power of appropriation that an American Congress is bound to respect. I imply no criticism upon the generous response which the Government has from time to time made to the appeals for help from the victims of great disasters. When the flood has come or the all-devouring fire, when the devastating locust has consumed the substance or the mysterious pestilence has wasted the lives of the people, we have spurned constitutional limitations and appealed for authority to afford relief to the sublime but perilous principle which recognizes the safety of the people as the supreme law. The generous motive has exempted the Government from unfriendly criticism, and that has passed unquestioned which if drawn into precedent in ordinary times and insisted upon would leave no limitations upon the power of appropriation.

But it is said the appropriation is small. That, Mr. Chairman, cannot and should not affect the principle; and it should be borne in mind that the revenues of this Government are so collected that when the Government raises $1 somebody else—the pampered recipient of its bounty—generally raises from three to five dollars. Whether the amount of tax be one cent or $1 per capita which will be imposed by this bill, I repeat, cuts no figure in the argument: and upon this point I beg the attention of the House to the memorable words of Junius, addressed to the English people, but quite as applicable to our own:

Let me exhort and conjure you never to suffer an invasion of your political constitution, however minute the instance may appear, to pass by without a determined, persevering resistance. One precedent creates another. They soon accumulate and constitute law. What yesterday was fact, to-day is doctrine. Examples are supposed to justify the most dangerous measures, and where they do not suit exactly, the defect is supplied by analogy. Be assured that the laws which protect us in our civil rights grow out of the constitution, and they must fall or flourish with it. This is not the cause of faction, or of party, or of any individual, but the common interest of every man in Britain.—Woodfall's Junius, volume 1, page 160

Sir, the voice of history has justified and approved and commemorated the resistance which Hampden made to the collection of the ship-money, and which our forefathers made to the collection of the tea and the stamp tax. These were "minute instances;" that is, the amounts involved were not large; but a great principle was at stake, and the struggle was for its vindication.

I pass from the question of constitutionality, leaving it to rest upon the argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COCHRANE,] the last of whom deserves great credit for resisting that tide of sentimental patriotism which, according to one of his colleagues, is sweeping resistlessly over his district, and demanding the passage of this bill.

An eloquent gentleman upon this floor [Mr. LAMAR] has lamented that the era of sentimental politics has passed and appeals for its restoration in a hopeful and pathetic strain. This centennial year and the issues which it makes prominent are bringing with them the full fruition of this patriotic aspiration. We are in the midst of such an era; and while the heart of the patriot hails it as most auspicious for our future as a united people, let his eye never be closed to the peril to which it may subject our system of government; and above all and beyond all, while he seeks to make ample and munificent preparations for the reception and entertainment of the coroneted nobility from the regions of the Arctic and the Antarctic, the Occident and the Orient, let him not exhaust his zeal nor fritter away his energies in too generous provision for their comfort and gratification to be at last subjected to the reproach of having ignored the millions of poor crownless heads whose eyes are turned imploringly toward this Capitol to-day. They are our countrymen, boasting no lineage except what is found in "the short but simple annals of the poor;" and while the attractions of the grand pageant in preparation will be drawing the nobility of other countries and our men of wealth and leisure, our bankers, our bond-holders, our railroad kings, and our imperial merchants to the birthplace of a nation, an honest poverty binds him to his modest home, whose every comfort is taxed to give zest to their enjoyment, as if to widen and deepen the contrast and complete his humiliation. He may, if rebuked for his insensibility to the greatness and majesty of the occasion, turn upon you and ask: "What special cause of rejoicing have I this day? My condition is worse this hour than it has been for years past. For long and weary months my cunning hands have been without employment. I am consuming even now the last of the earnings of an active life. The little property in which I had, as I thought, wisely invested has so shrunk in value as not to be worth the mortgage to which my necessities compelled me to resort. Above me impends bankruptcy and around me stalk the gaunt forms of privation and want." You do but mock him in unworthy imitation of the corrupt Cæsars when you ask him to forget his distress and drown his sorrow in healths to the honor of the centennial year; when you ask him to contribute from his exhausted stores to the success of an enterprise which will serve but to remind him by contrast of his own helpless and now almost hopeless condition.

Sir, I should be pleased to see this House turn its attention to the correction or amelioration of that vicious policy of Government, whatever it be, that has superinduced this state of things. Correct the evil by reversing an unwise, unpatriotic, and ruinous financial policy, by which a nation has been foully cornered in the interest of capital. Correct it by repudiating a principle which if persisted in must result in my humble judgment, in a money famine unparalleled in our history; paralyzation of industry; prostration in business; destruction of values, of confidence, of credit, and of hope; in a reign of poverty, want, and ruin. Do this, and you will have relieved the grand conception of a centennial celebration of incongruous surroundings that do so mar its majesty and detract from its worship.

I wish, sir, we could go further this centennial year and furnish a solution of another startling problem that confronts us, the fate of the indebtedness of the country, amounting in the aggregate, and including national, State, corporate, and private indebtedness, to $10,000,000,000—aptly described by an American scholar "as a mountain-load more deadly than fever or plague, more destructive than the frosts of spring or the blight of summer." However otherwise the American people can stand erect and walk under such an incubus, I feel sure, sir, that you might as well expect to see "the man who lies buried beneath the mountain-avalanche rise up and bear away his burden" as to see this nation contentedly or even patiently bear the load which this policy of sudden resumption will entail upon it. When that grand financial pyramid shall have been erected we will have illustrated the problem of ten billions of indebtedness resting upon $700,000,000 currency, and all resting upon, say, $300,000,000 specie, which is held at the sufferance and mercy of a foreign gold despotism.

To my mind, sir, there is little cause for rejoicing in the contemplation of these questions; but no amount of patriotic declamation can exorcise them or relieve us of the alternative of their solution, or of beholding at no distant day perhaps the wreck of our magnificent system of government. Republics cannot long survive the adoption of a governmental policy that tends with unerring certainty to the destruction of the primal principle of republican theory, the equality of the people; that builds up and sets upon thrones of gold a moneyed aristocracy on the one hand, and establishes a community of paupers on the other, crushing out the middle class, upon whose existence depends more than all else the peace, the welfare, and safety of the State.

There are, sir, two classes to be found in almost every portion of the South that I cannot suppose, Mr. Chairman, can have much heart in this grand pageant. I allude, sir, to the soldiers of the war of 1812 and to those who labor under disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. The one stands proscribed before the world for having, under the guidance of leaders whose wisdom I do not now criticize, allowed their sympathies to go with and follow their sons into a war into which they themselves were too infirm to participate. Most of them have passed away, but here and there lingers one unfortunate with the brand of proscription upon his aged brow, a monument of the injustice and ingratitude of a country whose honor he had maintained and whose integrity he had defended. I have in my district one of them, sir, who served under and was the orderly of General Andrew Jackson, now by fifteen years beyond the period allotted by the Psalmist to human life, shut out from the bounty of the Government in the hour of helpless decrepitude for having yielded to the same impulses that bore him to the shock of British arms and nerved him for the wild ferocity of Indian warfare. Like Lear to his ungrateful daughter, confessing his age to you, he implores you to grant him "raiment, bed, and food;" but hitherto his appeals have been vain.

The spirit that is proof against such appeal is not to my mind, Mr. Chairman, the true spirit of the centennial year. And so again, sir, of those who are yet aliens in the land of their fathers. The determination of many members upon this floor to support no measure of amnesty that was not as broad and sweeping as the Republic, including even the chief of the confederacy himself, is the offspring of devotion to a great and beneficent principle—a principle that compromises neither the safety nor the honor of the country, but tends to the security of the one and the elevation of the other, the only principle on this subject that is in full accord with the grand central idea of a centennial celebration.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have heard with some degree of regret in the course of this debate that there are peculiar reasons why southern representatives should support this measure. Their support of it, it is kindly intimated, would be accepted as a refutation of any suspicion of want of devotion to the interests of the Government from whose allegiance they were once estranged. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, it is the last of all the arguments that should have weight with them in considering the proposition. They know in their hearts to-day that it does them and their people grievous injustice. I should be pleased to see them, as I believe they will, spurn the restraint sought to be imposed by this illiberal appeal, and vote upon the proposition with reference to its abstract merits. And if in fact any refutation of the injurious imputation be still required, let them point, as they can with a melancholy pride, to a peaceful, law-abiding, industrious constituency, intent, in the face of many discouragements, upon the amelioration of their shattered fortunes, the improvement of their domestic polity, and rehabilitation of their States. It would be false to say of them that they are bound to this Government by the character of interest that attaches to it the lordly holder of its securities or the bloated recipient of its extorted and dishonest bounty. Their interest is not that of whisky-rings nor financial syndicates, embezzling revenues and making profit out of the honor and credit of Government, but it is the interest that a brave, conscientious, and sincere people feel in the success of a Government to whose protection and watchful care some of their highest interests have been committed. They will be true to it; and let us hope that from this centennial year we may date the inauguration of a policy that shall be true to them, to all sections, and to the highest interests of a united country.

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Chairman, Louisiana is in favor of the centennial celebration; with her State capital, the Queen City of the South, sitting almost at the foot of the Mississippi River, receiving the products of the great West and holding commerce with the nations of the world, she is alive to the commercial importance of this international exposition, while she is fully conscious of the great opportunity given by this celebration at Philadelphia to renew that feeling of patriotism which should animate the bosom of the whole American people.

We believe, Mr. Chairman, that this celebration will afford a greater opportunity for the people of the different sections of our country to mingle together than has ever occurred since we were a nation, and, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the sentiment that has been uttered upon this floor, as applied to the people of this nation, that we should know one another that we may love one another.

Representing in part a State whose great staple productions are cotton, sugar, and rice, possessing land whose productive capacity is not exceeded by that on the borders of the Nile, which is enriched annually by the same process that, going on for thousands of years, has produced the rich alluvia of the Mississippi Valley, I believe Louisiana, in common with her sister-States of the South, will have an opportunity afforded by the centennial exposition to direct the attention of the agents of capital and immigration, both of this and of foreign countries, to the great and very profitable field for investment and settlement.

Virginia, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee, vastly richer under the surface than on top; the Carolinas and Florida, with their diversity of agricultural resources and fine timber; Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, possessing the finest cotton-lands in the world, and the latter the finest sugar-land in the United States; while Texas, an empire in itself, with her great diversity of climate, soil, and production, offers the most inviting field for capital in this country, and the people of these States are too intelligent as well as too public-spirited not to embrace the great opportunity this year to be offered at Philadelphia for letting the world know of the advantages and inducements they are prepared to offer for the necessary means for their development.

Mr. Chairman, we go in for the old flag and an appropriation We are for an appropriation for the Centennial. We mean to be there, and we mean to exhibit our wonderful productions, and when the great American people, as well as the people of other nations, behold what we have been able to do in the Lower Mississippi Valley, with our broken levees and almost annually inundated country, we believe their voices will proclaim to you, their Representatives in Congress, that a people who have done so well unaided should receive the fostering aid of the General Government; that not only did you do right in making an appropriation to repair the broken levees, (this, we expect, will have been done before the end of the session,) but you should make it what it rightfully is—a great national work. Even the hardy sons of Michigan and Wisconsin, those States which under the able generalship of my friend from the first-named State [Mr. CONGER] have always carried off the big end of the river and harbor appropriations during the five years of my service in this House, will come down from the cold pineries of the North, even from the far-off Du Luth, that city of great expectations, so graphically delineated in the Forty-first Congress by the able gentleman from Kentucky, [MR. KNOTT,] who, judging from his benevolent and patriotic countenance, is centennially inclined. Even the people of these far-off regions, I repeat, will go down to Philadelphia, and after beholding our exhibition will resolve that the Mississippi Valley must hereafter be allowed to have a square deal.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I can say that the State of Louisiana, speaking here through her Representatives, is "for the old flag and for this appropriation."

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Chairman, those who are in favor of the object sought to be attained by the bill under consideration are met at the outset with the objection that the Constitution forbids this appropriation of money. If I regarded that question doubtful even, I should withhold my vote from this bill. I yield to no man on the other side of the House or on this in my devotion to the Constitution of the United States. I received my political education in the school of Jefferson. I began my political life a disciple of Jackson. I am, sir, a strict constructionist of the Constitution as distinguished from that which has been termed a latitudinarian construction. But, sir, there is a mode of construing the Constitution which dwarfs the Government of its fair proportions, and it is that mode of construction which gentlemen who oppose this bill have resorted to. In my judgment as well might it be claimed, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has said, that a private individual has not the constitutional right to prepare his feast and put on his best robes in order to receive his invited guests as to deny that this great Government has the power under the Constitution to provide for an appropriate celebration of the centennial of its existence. When, in 1824, General Lafayette came to this country as the invited guest of the nation and was received with such honors as never have been paid to a foreigner before or since, and when he bade farewell to the land he had helped to liberate, we sent him home in a Government vessel.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] might well inquire where did this Government get the authority under the Constitution to provide for that reception and for that return of our guest to his home. Mr. Chairman, the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has brushed away the cobwebs and mists of constitutional objections to this measure, and it is unnecessary for me to speak further upon that point. I have said that the construction called for here dwarfs this Government in its powers and makes it subservient to the sovereignty of the States. Let me advert to a single instance. After the presidential election in 1860, when madmen and recreant States were rushing into the whirlpool of rebellion and threatening to subvert and destroy the Union, the then President of the United States in his annual message to Congress declared that the Government of the United States had no power to put down the rebellion because it had no power to coerce States. There is the doctrine of State sovereignty subscribed to, I have no doubt, by the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Tennessee, who have been the most earnest in pressing this constitutional objection to the bill.

Sir, if this were a measure for the sole benefit of Pennsylvania or of Philadelphia, I should be inclined to vote against it by way of retaliation upon Pennsylvania for having given to the country such a President as Mr. Buchanan. [Laughter.] But, sir, it is not a question which belongs to Pennsylvania. This is a measure in which the whole people of the United States are concerned. Philadelphia is not to be blamed because the Declaration of Independence was signed there. Philadelphia is not at fault because John Adams wrote his celebrated letter from there proclaiming that the 4th of July should be a perpetual jubilee throughout all generations. It is the natural spot and the only spot which could have been selected appropriately for such a celebration. Mr. Chairman, the idea of the men who framed the Declaration of Independence was that the 4th of July was to be an annual and perpetual jubilee. So it has been observed. It is an epoch, a yearly occurring one. But, sir, we are about to celebrate our first centennial epoch. In looking over the utterances of the men who interested themselves in respect to the mission of this Republic and who were our friends though subjects of Great Britain, my eye has fallen upon a passage in a letter written by Robert Burns in the year 1788—the centennial year of English independence. Writing to a friend in that year he said:

> I will not, I cannot enter into the merits of the cause. But I dare say the American Congress in 1776 will be allowed to be as able and as intelligent as the English convention of 1688, and that their posterity will Celebrate the Centenary of their deliverance from us as duly and sincerely as we do ours from the oppressive measures of the House of Stuart.

Such grand conceptions as these, formed at that early period, are now about to be realized. We have invited the nations of the earth to come and join us in this centennial jubilee. They have signified their purpose to come. They have expended and will expend more than $1,300,000 of their own money upon the grounds set apart for this purpose, within $200,000 of what this bill proposes as the share of expenses to be borne by the United States. They are all to be represented here. We should be in a position to give them an honorable and creditable welcome. It is our celebration. It is the celebration by the whole people of the United States of this grand jubilee thus pointed out by the prophetic pen of the poet Burns.

I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the intelligent constituency I have the honor to represent on this floor, composed in part of the descendants of those who landed at Plymouth and the James, a constituency who admire the wonderful skill and science of Franklin and who reverence the broad liberality and philanthropy of William Penn, will cheerfully bear their part of the expense necessary to render this centennial celebration and exposition not only successful, but honorable to the United States, in whose name and behalf it has been proposed.

Sir, when the representatives of the governments we have invited shall reach our shores, I trust we shall be able to show to them that we are in the enjoyment of all that is typified in that grander prediction of an earlier day, the prophecy of Bishop Berkeley, written nearly fifty years before the Declaration of Independence was adopted, and which has now become familiar to every school-boy in the land:

> Westward the course of empire takes its way;
> The four first acts already past,
> A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
> Time's noblest offspring is the last.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am well aware that it will not be an easy matter for me to interest this committee, which now, for many days, has been so ably addressed upon the subject now before it. In the last Congress, I deemed it my duty to vote against the centennial appropriation. The amount asked for was three millions. In the present Congress, I deem it my duty to vote for this bill, calling for only one-half of this amount. To my own mind, it does not seem difficult to present sufficient reasons for this change of position on my part, and I think I shall be sustained by those whom I have the honor to represent on this floor.

The great event which it is proposed to celebrate, seems not to have impressed us all with its real dignity, character, and value. A republic, peculiar in its history, peculiar in its character, and peculiarly brilliant in its career, proposes to celebrate the termination of the first one hundred years of its existence. If we look but partially at the results of this one hundred years, we must be amazed at our progress in art, science, commerce, agriculture, and manufactures. Is it then an unnatural thing, or an unreasonable thing, that a government which has run a successful career, yes, one eminently successful, should determine to celebrate the termination of the first century-period of its existence, and exhibit not only for its own benefit but for that of the world, the triumphs, which, during this period it brought out to its own glory and the good of the world?

I am willing as an American citizen that all the world shall know of our triumphs. Yea! I am ambitious that this exhibition shall be worthy of ourselves; that we make ample provision for it, and well entertain the invited representatives of every nation on the globe. Standing on the sacred soil of Pennsylvania, we can proudly bid them look at the map of the Republic as it was when we started and as it is to-day; look at our population as it was then and as it is now—four millions then and forty now. Looking at this picture and then at that, they could but learn a lesson from this young Republic of the West, developing for itself a history and setting an example to the republics and the people of the world.

Mr. Chairman, you remember when during the Forty-second Congress we met in this Hall, when the ablest and best speakers of the House and of the Senate, yourself among the number, were called to the stand here to address the assembled Congress upon the death of the immortal Morse, the inventor of the telegraph. In my hand here I hold a copy of the book containing the memorial exercises in this Hall, and the like exercises in every State and in almost every city in the Union. Upon this book is inscribed "What hath God wrought!" Certainly was this book well and appropriately inscribed. The addresses herein, though grandly eloquent, were none too eulogistic. We and the world were properly asked to consider what this one man had wrought. Now if the invention of a single mind, if one of our great national achievements could thus call out these expressions from the civilized world, why should not we, as American citizens, be proud that at the termination of this one hundred years we may look not simply at this one triumph but at all the triumphs we have made?

The American citizen who shall enter the different halls at Philadelphia and there behold all the productions of the inventive genius of his fellow-countrymen which will there be exhibited, and specially turning his attention to machinery, shall examine all the various and complicated machinery fitted for propulsion by the ten thousand degrees of force used in the various manufacturing processes for which that machinery has been adapted, will justly be proud that his native country has wrought so well. He will feel that this Republic, in that it has given freedom to the human mind, in that it has given the largest liberty to all men freely to work, to investigate, and invent, has done more for the human race than any and all other governments. It is in our power to have a national centennial exhibition which shall give lasting honor to the character of our people and the genius of our Government.

I think that there has been in this discussion too much of the abstract. I care but little about the abstractions of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] about his logic concerning the Constitution. I am willing in regard to this great exposition to follow in the wake of the English and the French, to bring together in one grand mass what has been accomplished by this Republic, by the brains of its people, by their industry, energy, and well-developed character. That will be enough for me.

Mr. Chairman, the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] surpassed in my judgment any other speech on this question, in that he brought to view what the British and the French expositions did for England and France; yea, what we ourselves in millions and tens of millions secured from those expositions, simply because we sent commissioners there to examine their results. He told us that we have profited tens of millions; that we are to-day a prosperous nation in many branches of industry simply because of what these ten American commissioners gathered up as they studied the results of invention as in other countries it had triumphed. I shall take the liberty to incorporate in my remarks two or three sentences from his very able and eloquent speech.

Our products will not alone claim our attention and admiration, but they will be placed side by side with foreign products. We shall then learn wherein we excel and wherein we are behind. This latter will be of incalculable value, for the American mind only needs the stimulus which a great international exposition will furnish to render it still more active and successful.

The possible and probable advantages of our forthcoming national celebration and exposition are well illustrated by the following sentences in the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT:]

The English exhibition of 1851 had the effect to demonstrate that Great Britain was far inferior to continental nations in the arts of design, just as it demonstrated to the continental nations their inferiority to Great Britain in agricultural implements, in machinery, and in all branches of iron and steel industry. The English government at once established schools of design throughout the empire, while the continental nations took steps to improve their iron-works and machinery and develop their mineral resources. The exhibition of 1862 in London demonstrated the remarkable fact that in all the textile industries, in pottery, and in metal-work, requiring esthetic training and knowledge, Great Britain had overtaken if not gone ahead of her continental rivals, while she was beaten by Germany in her own stronghold by castings in steel so far in advance of her best results that Krupp's guns and wheels and tires were regarded with wonder and admiration approaching to incredulity. It is impossible to estimate the enormous pecuniary value of this progress to England and to Germany.

Again, at the date of the French exposition in 1867, the manufacture of Bessemer steel had begun to assume great prominence in Europe, but was only introduced into one establishment in this country, where its practice was comparatively rude and unprofitable. I had the honor to be one of the ten scientific commissioners appointed by the United States to study and report upon the exposition, and to me was assigned the subject of iron and steel. As commissioner every private establishment in England and France was opened to me, and I was thus enabled carefully to study the processes of manufacture, now so familiar but then so unknown to our metallurgists, and by the introductions which I was able to secure for our mechanical beginners to bring back the knowledge required for the successful establishment of this business. The result may be briefly stated, that we have now ten first-class establishments for the manufacture of Bessemer steel, capable of producing 500,000 tons per annum, enough to supply the demand of the country, and that the price of steel rails, which was then $140 per ton, has now fallen to $65 per ton, making an annual saving of $37,500,000 per annum. And, what is more remarkable, steel rails are now made and sold in this country as cheaply as they could be imported from abroad, and laid down west of the Alleghenies even if the duty were altogether removed.

In the presence of this grand result how unreasonable to withhold the small amount asked for in the pending bill.

There will be represented in our centennial exhibition not only our products, our inventions, our educational forces, but there will be represented properly the growth and capacities of the States. I have the honor to represent in part on this floor a State which only twenty-five years ago was in its swaddling-clothes, with a population of only 6 000; now with a population of 600,000. In 1850 it raised but 23,000 of grain, yet this last year, it raised 56,000,000 bushels, and the simple product of wheat alone was worth $25,000,000.

It seems to me, sir, that there may be in this exposition, this showing of the States, that there may be a just emulation and a just pride among them. The luster of any one star in this galaxy of States but adds to the brilliancy of the whole. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think it will not be out of place if by way of illustration I should show the character and capacity of Minnesota. Its area is 51,000,000 acres. As yet we have less than three million acres, or 5½ per cent., under cultivation. Yet 56,000,000 bushels were the grain product of this year. We have a place for 5,000,000 people.

To render the foregoing statistics more full and exact I will quote the following from the recent message of Governor Davis to our Legislature:

The census of 1875 exhibits the progress of agriculture for twenty-five years. When the Territory of Minnesota was organized in 1849 its population was 4,057. In 1850 there were only 157 farms, comprising about 3,000 acres, from which were produced 1,400 bushels of wheat, 6,000 bushels of corn, and 16,000 bushels of oats. A quarter of a century has worked wonderful changes. Our population is now 597,279; the number of tilled acres is 2,816,413. From these the production in 1875 was 31,475,000 bushels of wheat, 15,775,000 bushels of oats, and 9,500,000 bushels of corn. In ten years the population has increased 138 per cent., while the number of tilled acres has increased 302 per cent.

The following comparison-tables demonstrate our progress since 1860:

	1860.	1875.	Increase.	Increase per cent.
Population	172, 022	597, 279	425, 257	247

The area of the State in acres is 51,701,760, of which 14,106,269 acres have not yet been surveyed by the United States. In the 37,595,491 surveyed acres are 60,000 farms, of which, as above stated, 2,816,413 acres are under tillage, from which have been produced during the past year the results which are presented in the foregoing table, showing an actual product from agriculture alone of nearly $13 from each cultivated acre, the area under tillage being less than 5½ per cent. of the lands comprised within the boundaries of the State, or a product of about $61 to each man, woman, and child in the State.

We desire that these resources and capabilities of the State may be known. We believe it will attract the immigrant and many times repay to the State her share of the expense.

Already have we drawn largely from northern Europe—but we still present a wide and open door.

Let every other State be there. Let their products find a place there. The coal, the iron, the mineral, and agricultural States are all needed to show the vast possibilities of the Republic. The products of them all will show what we have been doing this past hundred years.

Mr. Chairman, with a saved and reunited Republic, starting out on another centennial period, why should we not come together? Why not forget the dead past? Why not let it be buried and buried forever out of sight, and start again upon a career that shall be as memorable in the book of time as the period over which we have already passed?

Sir, there can be and there will be upon exhibition at the centennial the food to stimulate greater and grander efforts. Whatever is an incitement to higher mental effort lifts up and ennobles a people. I fancy it will be a source of pride to us if we shall visit the centennial ground, to feel that what we shall behold about us are the achievements of our native land.

No Englishman, no Frenchman, no intelligent man anywhere on the globe, can stand up at the end of our first hundred years and say that we have not wrought well and gloriously as a government. While these material triumphs may hold our gaze they will also proclaim the presence of the free mind, the untrammeled intellect of America, that has given us the resplendent page that we as a nation have been writing this hundred years; that we are entitled to the place that the common judgment of the world gives us in the front rank of the great nations of the time. Can we hesitate to secure for this young Republic such a verdict? The epoch is memorable, the occasion is inspiring! Let us be equal to the dignity of each.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Chairman, I have no speech to make upon this interesting question; and if I had one I am in no condition of health to make it to-day; but I am glad of the opportunity to say a few words in explanation of the vote which I shall give upon this measure and of the vote which I gave upon a similar one two years ago.

Although, Mr. Chairman, it has been my constant practice to vote against grants of money or land for any purpose outside of the necessary expenses of the Government or what I considered to be such, yet I shall vote for this centennial bill with great pleasure. Two years ago I voted against a bill for a similar purpose. I did not do this because I lacked sympathy with the object. On the other hand I felt the deepest regret in placing myself against it; nor must what I say on this point be regarded as in any sense a criticism of the able gentlemen who differed with me on that occasion and favored the passage of that bill. On the contrary, I greatly admired the eloquence and force and patriotism with which they spoke; and it cost me some effort not to vote with them at that time, although I could not adopt their conclusions.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, at that time there seemed to me to be strong objections to the bill, objections which I cannot help thinking have now entirely passed away. It appeared to me then that there were certain great conditions which must be fulfilled in regard to this Centennial in order that it might be made acceptable to the great body of the American people. In the first place, it was evident to me that there must be what the whole people would regard as an equitable distribution of the pecuniary burden connected with the Centennial. But this could not have been secured unless that should take place which has since taken place, namely, that the citizens of Philadelphia and of the State of Pennsylvania should bear relatively a larger proportion of this burden. The people of the country felt, whether wisely or not, that Pennsylvania would reap certain great advantages from the Centennial—that the people of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania would have a better opportunity than more remote localities to make a creditable exhibition of their products. Their praiseworthy and just pride of locality would be gratified, and the city of Philadelphia would secure immense pecuniary advantages directly from the holding of the Centennial in t at city.

Without stopping to discuss just how much force these things which were stated in the press and among the people had, or ought to have had, it is now enough to remember that these opinions everywhere existed, and the people therefore could not have felt it was proper to tax the owner of a clearing in Kansas just as heavily as the owner of a hotel or restaurant in Philadelphia.

But, sir, if Congress had passed that bill at that time it would have been felt in Pennsylvania and everywhere that the Government was going to bear the whole expense of this Centennial, and undoubtedly (and I think everybody will agree with me in this) if Congress had passed the bill it would at once and wholly have stopped subscriptions among the people. I say this not in criticism of those who have since so nobly subscribed. It is simply that the people can always be persuaded very easily to let the Government bear the pecuniary burden when they find they can let it do so just as well as not. The result would have been, if we had passed the bill, that the burden of taxation for the support of the Centennial would have been placed over the whole country and the citizens of Oregon and California would have been taxed as heavily as the citizens of Philadelphia. This would not have given satisfaction to the country. But, sir, that bill did not pass—it failed, and what has been the result? Why, the citizens of Philadelphia, and of the State in which that city is located, have done most nobly. I learn that the subscriptions of stock by the people of that city and State amount to three and a half million dollars, a noble contribution to a great and patriotic object. And we are told that the total available fund for the purpose of the Centennial is now somewhat more than $5,000,000. This grand contribution, coming out of the very heart of the people, has been in my opinion the result of our refusing to pass a large appropriation bill two years ago. We should not have had this help from the people but for our refusal then. We have got it now. The people took hold of it in earnest. And it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, when we have thrown this pecuniary burden upon the people, and they have responded so nobly, we cannot well do less than to give them this moderate sum of one and a half millions to complete this glorious work. It is a modest request, and I shall not only vote for it but shall vote for it with my whole heart. Undoubtedly the whole burden of the Centennial would have been thrown upon the United States if the Government had put its shoulder under the load at that time. It would then have been allowed to carry the whole, but now the result is one which I think cannot fail to be satisfactory throughout the whole length and breadth of the land.

There was another condition, Mr. Chairman, which it seemed to me necessary to secure in connection with the Centennial, and that was the economical expenditure of the money that should be available for the purpose of preparing for it. The people, in the present condition of our finances, the state of trade in the country, and the hard times which prevail, demand thoroughly economical administration everywhere, and they especially demand it in connection with the Centennial. If the Government had taken upon itself two years ago the pecuniary responsibility of this business, it would greatly have checked the spirit of economy and retrenchment on the part of those who had charge of it. I mean by this no reflection upon them. I greatly honor them. I have no doubt they would endeavor to do the best they could, under any circumstances, to save money. But, sir, there is much they must have done by means of subordinates, and they could not easily have resisted the animus in favor of expansion which is breathed into any enterprise the moment it is understood the Government is to pay all the bills.

If the Government had at that time taken the whole burden on itself, the gentlemen in charge of the Centennial business would have found a new spirit of expenditure infused into it. Plans would have been enlarged, magnificent schemes would have come into everybody's head, and the result would have been undoubtedly that money would have been spent in a thousand ways with much less care than has now been the case. But as the Government at that time refused to make that large appropriation and threw the burden of the expense on the people, and they have gone forward and in the most self-denying manner subscribed this large sum, it has imparted the spirit of retrenchment and economy to the whole business. When it was found that the managers must rely principally upon what the people contributed in order to prepare for the Centennial, the greatest care in expenditure resulted. And although I did not go to Philadelphia the other day, and have not seen the buildings, a great many gentlemen in whom I have entire confidence assure me that the noblest results have been achieved there for the amount of money which has been available for the purpose. One gentleman, in whom I have great confidence, says that perhaps there never has been so great an enterprise in the United States, one in which so much money was to be spent, where it has been spent so carefully and where there is so much to show for it. It is perhaps the greatest triumph of economy, of good management, which our country has witnessed lately in the administration of a great fund. This, then, is a most valuable result.

Another thing which it seemed to me was absolutely necessary to be secured in connection with this centennial celebration, in order to make it respected and acceptable everywhere, was that it should somehow grow out of the very hearts and enthusiasm of the people. Now, if the Government had taken the whole business on itself, and had left nothing to the people, undoubtedly we could have made a big thing, for a great deal can be done with money. We might have got up a very great material show. It is a long way to the bottom of the Treasury of the United States, and with that Treasury to take money from immense buildings could have been erected, great collections could have been made, much advertising could have been done, there could have been much material preparation. But, sir, the danger would have been that that which, for an occasion of that kind, is worth everything else, is worth all the material exhibition—the danger would have been that that grand enthusiasm growing out of the heart, out of the affections, out of the patriotism of the people, which was needed to sanctify and consecrate the whole—the danger would have been that that grand enthusiasm would have been lacking.

If the people had found—if they had heard in some distant and remote way—that the Government was carrying on some great thing in the way of an exhibition, they would have let you carry it on and would not have become very much aroused. But now what has been the result? Why Congress, two years ago, said to the people, "This is your Centennial if it is anybody's. Do not suppose that we are going to force the Centennial upon you; if you, who are descendants of revolutionary sires, of the great and the good that once trod this soil, if you want the Centennial, you shall have it; but if you do not want one, if it is a matter of no interest to you that the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of the nation is soon coming round, if you do not care anything about that, why let it go. We are only here to represent the feeling which you have in regard to the matter. We throw this whole thing upon you; the people shall say whether they want to celebrate this day or not." And what was the result, sir? Why, the people began to wake up; they began to say to each other, "Don't you know there is not going to be any Centennial unless we attend to it, unless we have an interest and do something about it." And so they went to work subscribing for stock and forming committees throughout the length and breadth of the land. And I suppose that, in my own State of Ohio, there is hardly a town of considerable importance in point of population and wealth where there is not a committee of the most respectable citizens of the town at work this very day to contribute in some way, directly or indirectly, to this grand result. Thus, sir, we say that it is always a safe thing in any great and noble cause t appeal to the people. We shall always find, for grand causes, something in the great popular heart that will respond.

The people have become interested. Everybody is talking about going to the Centennial; and I belive it is due in great part to the fact that we committed the whole business to them and said, "This is your Centennial if it is anybody's, and you must see to it." Now, sir, it seems to me that it would be a most ungraceful thing, after this noble enthusiasm is kindled everywhere and burning bright in almost every home and every heart, for us to say that we will not give the moderate sum of a million and a half; that after the people have subscribed three or four or five millions themselves we will not contribute that comparatively small sum to help them with this burden, and to show that the Government as representing this enthusiasm is willing also to do something. And thus, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the objections which originally existed have all been removed, and that we are now left at liberty to contemplate with unalloyed satisfaction those noble results which usually accompany great exhibitions of this kind. And when in addition to that we also remember that it is the one hundredth anniversary of our nation's birthday, when all the sacred and grand associations that belong to the occasion are revived in our minds, then we add to the considerations of utility the grace of poetry and the charm of romance and all the lofty enthusiasm of patriotic feeling.

Mr. SAVAGE. I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, in the fifteen minutes allotted to me in this discussion, to speak of the constitutional considerations that enter into this question. It is sufficient for me to say that I concur in the main with the arguments of the gentlemen who have opposed this appropriation. It is much easier to sneer at the constitutional arguments that have been presented by my young friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRANE] and the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] than it is to answer them, and the gentlemen who are in favor of the appropriation proposed to be granted in this bill have resorted to that kind of argument rather than to any attempt to answer the proposition advanced by these gentlemen; and it seems to me that they adopted the prudent course in the matter, for there is no answer that can be given to them, except the one advanced by one gentleman who favors this appropriation: that there is no constitutional limitation except a wise discretion that is vested in Congress; and I hope, for the honor of the American Congress, that there are but few who would concur in this one.

But there are some things in this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the House; one thing in particular, which was alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] It has not been alluded to by any one who favors this appropriation, whom I have heard, and that is to the effect of granting an appropriation of $1,500,000 of the money of the people of this country, with the provision in the bill that the Government of the United States shall only share pro rata in the amount that may remain when this centennial institution is in a condition to distribute its funds among its stockholders. The provision of the law to which I allude reads as follows:

Provided, That in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the centennial board of finance, after the payment of its debts, as provided for by the tenth section of the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said centennial board of finance, the appropriation hereinbefore made shall share equally with the holders of the said centennial stock, and a like percentage thereon be paid into the United States Treasury as may be paid to the holders of the said stock.

Here is a private corporation. It is authorized by the law under which it was created to have capital stock to the amount of $10,000,000. Already the sum of $2,300,000 has been subscribed to the capital stock. Let us suppose that in the future there will be sufficient private subscriptions to bring the stock subscribed up to $3,000,000. The Government of the United States puts into this pool the sum of $1,500,000, bringing up the entire subscription of stock to the amount of $4,500,000. Now, sir, this organization goes forward in this work, and if it succeeds—and we all hope and trust it may be a success—and at the expiration of the exposition, and after all debts have been paid, suppose the amount of money remaining in the hands of the board of finance to be distributed should amount to $1,500,000. Instead of there being a provision in this bill to return the whole $1,500,000 to the Treasury of the United States as a loan that the Government had advanced, it is only proposed that the Government shall share pro rata with the holders of said centennial stock; and, as the amount appropriated by the Government is one-third of the entire stock subscribed, it would receive but one-third of the amount on hand at the date of final settlement. In other words, sir, the Government subscribes $1,500,000 to the advancement of this association, and at its expiration, and when its concerns come to be wound up, if there is a surplus in their hands of $1,500,000, the Government will receive $500,000, and $1,000,000 goes into the pockets of private corporators of this institution, or in that ratio, whatever may be the actual amount on hand.

Now, is that just? Is it right that the people of this country should put a million dollars into the pockets of the gentlemen who are stockholders in this institution? For, disguise it as you may, if this institution is successful, (and its friends claim it will be,) two-thirds of whatever amount is appropriated by Congress will go into the pockets of these gentlemen. I do not wonder that they are anxious for an appropriation. Would it not be better, if this money is to be appropriated at all, would it not be more just to the people, that the Government, instead of receiving only a pro rata amount, should be put upon the footing of a creditor of, rather than a stockholder in, the institution and receive the whole amount appropriated before any division is made among the stockholders?

These gentlemen come here, as was well said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COCHRANE,] admitting that, in consequence of financial embarrassment among the people, they have failed to get the amount which they desired subscribed; and they now ask us, as the Representatives of these same people, to appropriate this sum, not out of our own money, but out of money belonging to those people who have refused to subscribe the amount wanted. It is not just to the country that their Representatives should do that which the principals themselves would not do; and especially is this true of the proposition to appropriate this amount of money and put it in a position where it will ultimately enrich the pockets of the few individuals who happen to be stockholders in this institution.

Mr. Chairman, that is enough upon that point, for it brings this question before the House, and that is all I hoped to do. I desire, however, to allude to another thing. There has been an attempt from the commencement of this debate—and I now address myself particularly to gentlemen who are here representing the South—to place the Representatives from the Southern States in a situation in which they would be compelled to vote for this appropriation, on the ground and for the purpose of showing to the North that they are fully and entirely reconstructed. In other words, sir, it is sought to impress upon the minds of the Representatives from the South that there is a demand on the part of the people of the North that the southern members shall violate what is to them a plain constitutional duty, and vote for an appropriation of a million and a half of dollars, for the purpose of satisfying the people of the North of their good-will toward the Union and as evidence of perfect reconciliation.

Now, sir, in my opinion the people of the North and Northwest desire no such sacrifice at your hands. I speak especially for my own district when I say this. I will say further to you gentlemen who represent the South on this floor that every vote you give is watched and scrutinized by the people of the North, and if you violate a plain constitutional duty it will be marked down against you. It is said at the North that southern representatives will go into all kinds of extravagance, and that if a voice be given to the South extravagance and corruption will be the rule, until the expenditures of our Government will be doubled and trebled; and every vote from the South given for this bill will be cited as proof of the truth of these charges. Some people at the North would be glad for a vote for this bill as a pretext that would justify them in making these charges against you. They will say, and with some show of truth, that you gentlemen in voting for this proposition have violated a construction of the Constitution which has been a cardinal doctrine of the democratic faith from time immemorial. Besides, sir, in my opinion the people of the North do not ask for this appropriation. It is a few only of those who will be immediately benefited that are here urging the passage of this bill. The great mass of the people of this country, and especially the western portion of it, have no interest in this show at all except perchance it may have been a tendency to give a great name to the people of this country.

I am not, however, Mr. Chairman, one of those who believe that it will have even that effect. In my opinion it will not benefit my constituents one farthing. For these reasons I feel compelled to vote against this bill, however much I might desire to see the success of this celebration; and I do not think that a failure to obtain this subsidy will in the least retard its success. I have thought proper to say what I have said upon this question with a view of aiding in presenting this matter in the light in which I think it ought to be looked at at least by all the democrats on this floor.

Mr. KASSON. I venture to ask the attention of the House for a few moments, because I do not intend to engage in the sentimental part of the debate, much as I appreciate the sincerity of the gentlemen who have appealed to the sentiment of patriotism. But I do wish to state some practical points, I may say points of business, to the gentlemen or this House, who are fully competent to draw their own conclusions from the facts. I of course leave the gentlemen of the Southern States who are friendly to this measure to express their gratitude for the somewhat threatening advice just given them by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAVAGE.]

It has been said on this floor that if we refuse the appropriation now asked, the State of Pennsylvania, under the stress of circumstances, will come forward with the additional million and a half and pay it rather than to have the enterprise a failure. To that I answer that the State of Pennsylvania, by its constitution adopted since its former appropriation, has deprived itself of the power to make any additional appropriation for this or any other enterprise of the kind. That is a sufficient answer to that suggestion.

Again, I call the attention of gentlemen who desire to deal intelligently and honestly with this question to the proposition made here that if we fail to make this provision for the Centennial Commission now, the commission itself may mortgage its property and thus raise the money to meet the necessary remaining expense of the enterprise. I now call the attention of gentlemen from Pennsylvania on this floor to the answer which I make to that suggestion, in order that they may correct me if my information, coming from one of their number, is incorrect. My answer is, that this corporation has no power to make an available mortgage; first, because the ground on which this property stands is not the property of the corporation, but property which cannot be alienated by them, or by any other body, for any such purpose. It is a park belonging to the city of Philadelphia, and cannot be subject to mortgage, and the buildings upon it are attached to that ground.

Still gentlemen may say that they may mortgage their buildings, because they have a right to remove them. To that I answer, on the same authority, that a chattel mortgage is not known to Pennsylvania laws; or if it could be executed under special laws, it would only be a mortgage upon scrap-iron and broken glass at the end of the exhibition.

I call the attention of gentlemen to these points, because I know the business men of this House desire to vote intelligently, and upon the facts, and not upon the appeals of the demagogue, nor upon misstatements of the legal and actual condition of things.

One other point remains. I must express, in passing, my earnest regret that the old and eminent Commonwealth of Virginia has with so much zeal declared her reluctance to bear any part of the expense or to undertake any official participation in an enterprise of this commemorative character. We of the new States have believed that the old colonial States, standing as they did one hundred years ago shoulder to shoulder in the fierce battles and great trials of the seven years of the Revolution, should now come together and take each other's hands and say, "Let us transport ourselves back for one hundred years to the precious memories of that time, and let us, in the presence of these glorious records of our history, forget more recent difficulties." I regret that Virginia and all the other old States have not unanimously said, "We are willing to share with you our small portion of the expense of such a commemorative enterprise."

It is not for me to censure them. Instead of doing that, we find them stating the remarkable proposition that under the Constitution that makes us a united government, embracing all the States, we have not the power to commemorate our own existence. If such is our Constitution, then there is no other country on the face of the earth, republican, democratic, or monarchical, that has a constitution which prohibits the memorials of its own existence. If it has the right to have a flag, under what express clause of the Constitution do you get that right? How do you pay for the bunting that floats over your Capitol? Under any clause of the Constitution? "Bunting" is not mentioned in the Constitution. "Flag" is not mentioned in the Constitution. There is no "express" power in the Constitution to make a flag. It is not necessary to the existence of your Government that you should have thirteen stars or that you should have thirty-seven stars on your flag.

I do not think that gentlemen can take the position that any nation on the face of the globe has not a constitutional power to celebrate fitly its own glorious record and an event of its own history.

But I go beyond that; that is not a sufficient answer to the argument of the opponents of this bill, nor can I make a complete answer to their whole theory of constitutional construction in the limited minutes allowed to me. If the time shall come during the session when I can fitly do so, I shall be glad to take fuller notice of the "unconstitutionality" of the arguments that have been presented by two of the gentlemen on the other side, [Mr. COCHRANE, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia.]

For the present I beg those gentlemen to allow me to ask them under what power in the Constitution have you built your custom-houses? Under what power have you built your bonded warehouses? Under what power have you taken snags from your rivers running between the different States and improved their channels, and removed the obstacles from the harbors of Galveston, New Orleans, Charleston, and other cities? Under what power have you regulated steamboats and controlled all the officers of those steamboats? Under what power have you made ambulatory post-offices on railroads and made railways post-routes? Gentlemen tell us that this is all right, that this is all legal, that it has been done from the beginning and is still done. But steamboats did not exist nor were there railways when the Constitution was made. Then you necessarily tell me that the Constitution is elastic, and that you must adapt its provisions to new inventions and to new conditions of things. And you are right. "Post-routes" in the Constitution were never intended to embrace railways; "post-offices" never meant an ambulatory post-office running from New York to Chicago. Steamboats were not contemplated at that time. Under what power, then, have we done this? We have done most of this, and much more, because the Constitution gave us power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

Now, let us bring the argument to the point to this very question. You have as a Congress of the United States invited the bringing to your shores of a vast quantity of articles that constitute commerce between foreign countries and America. You have invited every State in the Union to send its articles of commerce to the same place to which you have invited foreign nations to send theirs. All these are articles of commerce. When you have by your general laws allowed foreigners to send their articles of commerce to this country for sale or re-export, you have built your custom-houses and your bonded warehouses to receive them and to accommodate the wants of this commerce, as well as to protect the interests of the United States. You have done the same thing for our own State products which are taxed for the internal revenue and are intended for export under bond or for drawback. There is no "express" power in your Constitution to do this; but it is implied as an incident to the regulation of commerce, and is required in the development of the country. No gentleman will deny it.

Now, having invited the sending of all these articles of commerce from foreign countries and from the different States of the Union to one central place, what will you do with them? Does your Constitution require you to leave them exposed to the rays of the sun and the storms of heaven? Would you have left your imported articles of commerce in that way? On the contrary, you have provided buildings for them; and nobody denies your right to do it under the Constitution. The goods destined to this exposition go to it under bond and subject to duties if not re-exported, and you are asked to provide for them.

Stripped of its sentiment, stripped of its patriotism—and from my heart I am sorry to be obliged, in order to satisfy any gentleman on this floor, to strip this question of its patriotic element—but stripped of its patriotic element, I say this proposition is simply to appropriate money enough to build a shelter for goods coming to us by our own request from foreign countries and from the States of this Union, and to provide safe custody for them, as we have done in the case of bonded warehouses and custom-houses for general commerce.

Mr. SAVAGE. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to make a single suggestion.

Mr. KASSON. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. SAVAGE. Several gentlemen on this side understood the gentleman to claim that under the law no mortgage can be given on the property of this corporation.

Mr. KASSON. I stated it on the authority of two members from Pennsylvania, that, under the laws of that State and in the condition of the title of the corporation, their buildings being erected on property which they do not own and subject to the right of removal, they cannot execute a mortgage that will cover the realty; that they cannot affect by a mortgage anything but what they hold under their reserved right of removal. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. SAVAGE. It is provided in the act creating this corporation that—

> The centennial board of finance shall have authority to issue bonds not in excess of its capital stock, and secure the payment of the same, principal and interest, by mortgage upon its property and prospective income.

Mr. HOPKINS. That act cannot interfere with the law of Pennsylvania, which does not recognize any such thing as a chattel mortgage.

Mr. KASSON. I am glad to be assured by the chairman of the committee [Mr. HOPKINS] that I have stated the matter correctly—that, except as to the property to be removed, they have not such a title as to be able to execute a mortgage; and when that property comes to be removed you have, as I have before said, old iron and glass as security for the mortgage. That was my original statement. I further say that even for a chattel mortgage of this kind (if that be the name by which it is known in Pennsylvania) sixty days' notice would be required before it could be executed by a corporation like this, and that would carry us forward nearly to the time for the opening of the exposition. Then remains the question of negotiating such bonds.

I return now to the point I was making on the constitutional question. I ask gentlemen's attention to the fact that this proposition is to make provision by an appropriation for shelter, protection, and proper custody for articles of commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, for which there is an express and direct power in the Constitution, if you have any express and direct power to build custom-houses and bonded warehouses for commerce.

As I have said before, I content myself with merely calling attention to the points to which I have alluded, submitting the question to the judgment of the committee. For myself, while I could not vote two years ago for the bill then before us, I have been convinced that after the extraordinary and successful results of private effort it is but just for the Government now by an appropriation of a fixed sum to make this enterprise a success. I confess that my head would be bowed down in humiliation and shame in case of its failure. Let us do something. I implore gentlemen to avoid the present peril; for what is this respectable sum compared with the dishonor of the country if this enterprise should fail, as it seems to me it must fail in the actual condition of its affairs if this appropriation be not made?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this subject of appropriating a million and a half of money in aid of the centennial board of finance at Philadelphia has elicited an unusually interesting and able discussion. It has given rise, not unnaturally, to debate and arguments somewhat foreign to the real issue. It has upon both sides of this House, in considering the question of constitutional power, given rise to expressions of opinion as to the nature of our Government and the power of Congress under the Constitution to appropriate money to a purpose not directly connected with the administration of government.

While, sir, I do not think the Constitution should be invoked upon every light occasion, I think that its limitations on the power of Congress should never be lost sight of, and those limitations must govern, no matter what may be the urgency of the measure. If it is clear that the Constitution does not authorize the act, there is the end of the argument; but if that be doubtful, then the question of expediency becomes important.

In discussing this question it seems to me as important to consider the expediency of the measure as the constitutional power involved. I will not enter upon the constitutional question; the question of expediency is one which strikes me as one of almost equal moment; and yet I fully agree with the gentlemen who have presented with such marked ability this question of constitutional power, that the appropriation of money as is here proposed, for a purpose beyond the actual and direct objects of government, is not warranted by the Constitution, but not because this is not a nation, as has been argued by the gentleman from Virginia, for if there be anything settled and confirmed beyond recall or reversal in the progress of this one hundred years, it is that solemn declaration uttered by the trusted representatives of the people nearly a century ago, that the sovereignty of the people, not the sovereignty of the States, was the solid foundation upon which the political structure of this Republic rested, forming, sir, not a confederacy of States, but a nation; and if these hundred years, with their grand and blessed memories, carry down into the coming centuries any final judgment upon which there can be no review and from which there can be no appeal, it is that these United States constitute a nation—a nation, sir; not a confederacy of States. These States, with ample and absolute powers of local government, organized into a nation by the Constitution—a nation the political powers of which are at once conferred and limited by the Constitution, but within the limits of these powers absolute and supreme and resting, like the political powers of the State, on the sovereignty of the people. "We, the people of the United States, * * * do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America" are words too positive and clear for comment, and the purpose and wisdom of their utterance has grown clearer with every year of our history.

This is a nation, sir; but its powers are clearly defined and limited by the Constitution. The Constitution of the United States does as clearly emanate from and derive its vital force from the people as do the constitutions of the States of the Union. And in the one as in the others the people have wisely limited the powers of their representatives. I fully agree with gentlemen that the Constitution does not confer on Congress the power to make this appropriation, for it is not an appropriation for a direct object of Government in the administration of its powers; but this is no less a nation because the people have wisely limited the power of their representatives.

Yes, sir, the political powers of this nation rest on the sovereignty of the people. That was not only declared in the solemn instrument by which this Government was formed in language which can never perish, but has been re-affirmed again and again upon every battle-field where the flag of the Republic floated from the day that the Constitution was ratified down to the present hour. It is a nation, sir. It speaks through its accredited representatives the voice of a nation. It speaks to all the nations of the earth as a nation. No finesse of argument, no subtlety of reasoning, can impair the force of the words of that instrument of our fathers which has come down to us through all these years—

> We, the people of the United States, * * * do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

The question beyond the question of constitutional power is one of expediency. Is it expedient, sir, to appropriate $1,500,000 out of the public Treasury to a corporation of citizens for the purpose of celebrating, either by an international exposition of the industries of the nations or otherwise, the first centennial anniversary of American Independence in one of its leading cities? Is it a proper thing for Congress to do? Is it a legitimate and proper act on the part of the representatives of the people? Do the people desire the appropriation of money from their Treasury for this method of celebrating their great anniversary? Will the splendid display and imposing spectacle that this lavish expenditure will promote encourage the frugal simplicity of republican institutions?

I have heard read from the Clerk's desk during this session petitions for the removal of taxes, but I have heard no petition coming from the people of this country asking that Congress should exercise the questionable constitutional power of appropriating money for a purpose not necessary to the administration of their Government. Not one petition to that effect has been presented from the people! Forty millions of people, and yet not one petition has come to this House asking that this appropriation should be made. Monarchies do not hestitate to tax the people to display the splendor of government. Can you assume that the people desire this appropriation of their earnings? Not a petition has reached you asking for this increased taxation. The only voice uttered in this Hall from the people during the present session has been that which demands the reduction of the burdens resting upon their labor. Your great public debt is increasing. You have already appropriated out of the Treasury $505,000 to exhibit the result of our industries at this exposition. Yet one million and a half of dollars is now proposed to be appropriated, not to meet the imperious necessities of Government, but to gratify our just pride in the progress we have made in this hundred years. I will not dwell upon the amount, although it is not the mere bagatelle which my friend from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] has suggested. Be it more or less, the principle involved is the same.

The people do not require, so far as their will has been expressed here except by their Representatives, the appropriation of this money and the increase of their taxation. At the end of our first century of independence every American citizen is conscious that there should be a grand celebration in honor of the grand event, a grand exhibition of the products of their industries, a voluntary celebration and not an exhibition of the old idea of power, displayed in the remorseless taxation of a people—a celebration of the grand achievements of a great century, a celebration of the progress of a free people in a single century! Will a display of the taxing power of Government involved in this bill harmonize well with the free spirit and personal independence for which the past century is so wonderfully entitled to commemoration?

To commemorate the progress of our Republic through this century in spirit and in truth the whole people must participate. In this broad land, extending from the one ocean to the other, our people cannot celebrate the Fourth of July, 1876, in the spirit of the past century in any one of the great commercial cities alone, no matter how grand the memories that cluster around it. O, no! Everywhere the 4th day of July, 1876, will be celebrated with sentiments of gratitude and joy. Those bonfires to which my friend from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] so eloquently alluded the other day "will be lit up all over this blessed land, on the plains and hills and mountains, in every hamlet and village and town and city between the great oceans, and anthems of praise and thanksgiving to the God of our fathers for the preservation of the nation and for this noble heritage of freedom will be uttered by a great and prosperous people as they review the triumphs of the receding century. It will be a great celebration of a great century by the people. No display in any city in this land can have the magnitude that will fairly represent the patriotic enthusiasm, the true heart of this nation throbbing in exultation over the successful close of this first century of freedom. No, sir, this celebration must be the outgrowth of the majesty of the public joy, the voluntary act of a free people, not of power.

What is the grand idea of this centennial? It is the display in spirit and in truth of the principle which the Declaration of Independence proclaimed to the world and which the Constitution crystallized into form. It is the majesty of the people as the source of all political power, and government only a limited agent of the public will for the public good, and the independence of the citizen the great center of all. Does increased taxation by act of Congress in a matter fully within the scope of individual action comport well with this idea? Is a splendid display obtained by taxation a jubilee in imitation of the great jubilees of the Hebrews, which proclaimed freedom to the captive and the removal of burdens from the shoulders of the oppressed?

We stand upon the verge of two centuries of the Republic; the one recedes with its great achievements and leaves the nation in the vigor of its youth, the other opens up before us with still greater hopes for us and for the human race. The deadly peril to which a republic is exposed is not a hidden rock but standing out fully exposed, warning and threatening. It is the corruption that springs from venality in public affairs, taxation, and expenditures beyond the frugal wants of Government. Its most perilous form is subsidy—appropriations outside of the strict and severe demands of Government!

I implore this House not to yield to the strong and patriotic motive to make this appropriation, for with a patriotic motive you confirm and establish a dangerous precedent. At the end of a hundred years we are in the main, in the institutions of government, without a blemish upon our record. Our history for seventy-five of these one hundred years the people of this country can read without a blush; a hundred years where the public good in the main has been the master motive; a hundred years of honest government. I speak of the administration of government, except in recent years, when grants beyond the absolute requirements of Government, and outside of its legitimate purposes, into which Congress has been betrayed by strong pressure, have produced their natural and unhappy fruits; and then the nation has blushed. It is not so much in the amounts that have been involved, but in the peril to national honor. Entering upon a new century, I would appeal to gentlemen that seeing, as all must see, the perils of yielding to demands upon the public resources beyond the severe purposes of government, not to make this mistake. Let us now and here by a great example end the fatal policy of subsidy. In strictness this may not be such, but if made it will be quoted as such through the century; and entering upon a new century, I appeal to the House that it shall not be characterized in its opening moments by a grant which shall be appealed to again and again in all the coming years as justifying the appropriation of money from the public Treasury for purposes not demanded for the frugal administration of the powers of the Government. Let us make the refusal of this grant an example for frugal government, a memorial of a high purpose to limit the demands upon the industries of our people to the imperative demands of government frugally administered, to be appealed to through all the years of the coming century.

I would not see this enterprise fail. No citizen can consent it should fail. It must not fail. The people themselves will see to it, sir, that it does not fail. I do not question that the power conferred upon this corporation by the act of Congress is ample to enable it to raise the money it requires. They can, as authorized by that act, pledge their property and resources and secure the necessary means without our setting up a dangerous land-mark in entering upon the new century. We need not fear that the people of this country will permit this enterprise to fail if it comports with their sentiments of duty and honor that it should succeed. That question does not belong to us as representatives of the people; but if the people themselves deem it proper that this display of national greatness and of national industry should be made they will not permit the enterprise to fail. Gentlemen should not underestimate the real patriotism of our people. Whether you make this appropriation or not, the display at Philadelphia will be a grand event.

In my judgment, you but weaken the voluntary energy and patriotism of the people by this appropriation.

In support of this, permit me to say that I hold in my hand, sir, a letter from one of the commissioners of this centennial celebration, a gentleman of very high character, a senator of one of the States of this Union. He thus expresses himself upon this subject:

> Since I saw you in Washington two weeks ago I have seen twelve or fourteen members of the United States centennial commission. A majority of them with whom I have talked on the subject are strenuously opposed to the passage of the centennial appropriation, the bill now pending in the House; and its becoming a law will not help but damage the centennial exhibition.

For these reasons hastily given I am compelled to vote against this appropriation of money. I trust and hope the House will not take this step. The very exigency of this measure, the very strength of the patriotic emotion brought to its support, rise up as the strongest argument that we seize this occasion to establish a great precedent. If you defeat this measure, if you say the centennial celebration at Philadelphia as everywhere else shall be under the auspices of the people of the United States as citizens, and shall not be under the auspices of Federal taxation, you will have done the grandest act and set the most valuable precedent of which Congress is capable: a monument of duty and obedience to the Constitution at the beginning of the new century; a living declaration that there shall be no approach to subsidy and that the taxes imposed upon the people by its Government, already grown fearfully oppressive, shall only be such as the exigencies and necessities of the Government imperatively require. If the coming century is to be a century of economy and purity in government this bill must fail, and its failure will give a high guarantee for another century of the Republic.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, it is apparent to the House that I am not expected to make any reply to that part of the speech of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] which was based upon a letter which he has just read to the committee. I think the sting has been clearly drawn by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania who have replied to him, and in my opinion in a proper, though characteristic manner. My friend from Indiana has made what might be considered to be a very effective speech, but as it was mainly based upon the facts contained in that letter, I imagine that its force has already been dissipated. He claims, Mr. Chairman, that this country, recognized throughout the world as a republic, formed by the confederation of States which gave to it the powers held by the Federal Government, is a nation. In dealing with the question now before the committee I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to contest this opinion, but I do claim that if we are a nation, or if we be a republic, entitled to that appellation or not, still in all our engagements we will consult the best interests of the people, ay, and maintain true economy, by keeping our plighted faith both at home and abroad.

The constitutional objection, Mr. Chairman, that is raised to this appropriation is one with which I do not feel myself called upon to deal. My mind at least is happily at rest on that question. When, two years ago, it was proposed in this House to vote $3,000,000 in behalf of this industrial exposition, this centennial, I cheerfully, and I believe with patriotic motives and with a conscience not interrupted by constitutional scruples, gave it my voice and my vote. Mr. Chairman, although I have had reason to ponder the able arguments which have fallen from the lips of gentlemen on this side of the House, I may say my conviction remains unshaken that it is not only our patriotic duty but it is our constitutional right to vote this appropriation.

A sufficient and convincing reply to the constitutional objection is found in the long line of precedents, from the days of Jefferson even to our own time, construing that section of the Constitution by which this appropriation is maintained. We have found all parties, statesmen of every creed represented in the line of these precedents, voting appropriations to similar objects or to objects which do not commend themselves with as much appropriateness and force as does the bill before the committee.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to what I consider the position of the General Government in relation to this exposition. I have carefully read the different acts which have been passed by former Congresses, and I find there that the General Government plights its faith and honor to forward and, in fact, to guarantee the success of this exposition.

I find that the General Government, through the executive department, by the authority of the legislative branch, has invited the nations of the world to come here and participate in this our centennial celebration. Thirty-eight foreign nations have accepted our invitation. Fourteen of them have appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 to enable them and their people to be represented in Philadelphia in this our centennial year, and the other nations will make that sum up to over $5,000,000. And to our own shame, to our discredit, shall it be said that we are hesitating over the pitiful sum of $1,500,000—we who claim to have the purest and the best government upon earth; we who claim to be the leading nation of the world, the only republic worthy of the name now in existence?

Why, sir, what do we mean? Have we not fostered this exposition, have we not indorsed it, have we not guaranteed it! Have we not been told by those who represent us, our delegated agents, that unless this appropriation is made this enterprise will be a failure and a disgrace and a dishonor to the American name? If that be true, is there any further reason required, any other motive, to move the patriotic heart of an American; is there required any voice or any constitutional arguments in favor of the demand that we shall meet our plighted faith, that we shall not invite foreign nations to a feast, and have that feast barren of fruit and everything that will give us the character of a host who is dealing worthily and honorably with his guests?

Every motive of patriotism and desire for material success, pride in our progress and national glory, commend this enterprise to our consideration; every interest impels us to do all in our power to secure success in this coming celebration. We are a great nation; we expect that when our sons travel in foreign lands they will be honored and respected as the representatives of the American Republic. Let us not, in this the hundredth anniversary of our Independence, allow it to be said by any stranger, with the finger of scorn pointed at the American flag, that we invited the whole world to become our guests, and were so unworthy and dishonorable that we treated them with contempt and derision in failing to provide properly for their entertainment and accommodation.

Now, dismissing this view of the subject, I desire in the few moments left of my time to call the attention of the committee to a single portion of the speech of my senior colleague of the delegation from the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, [Mr. SWANN.] He joins with me in favoring this appropriation of $1,500,000. But in the course of his remarks he used this language:

> I am one, Mr. Chairman, who will not consent to restrict by any concession of mine the powers of the Government as heretofore claimed and acted upon. They have become incorporated and interwoven with our legislation, notwithstanding the argument of my friend from Virginia, and cannot be lightly or incautiously approached. It would be a mistake which we would never cease to regret. I want no more trammels put upon us than those which already exist; and there are some of those not so firmly established by legitimate constitutional authority that I would not unite in abolishing, if I had the power to-day. I have no fear of any encroachment upon the legitimate functions of the States; and all that I claim is that the constitutional powers which have always been heretofore recognized and acted upon should not be so far abridged as to interfere with whatever is deemed essential to the successful working of our system. The people do not desire any such change, and it is questionable whether this Government would not be shorn of its best and most essential feature if it was brought under arbitrary subjection to any power higher than its own, or that it would meet the approval of the people any more than it does now.

I have given the exact words of his speech, that I may do him entire justice. I dissent most emphatically from the propositions he here lays down. He tells us that the latitudinarians upon the other side of the House, who have controlled this Government for a period of fifteen years, have encroached upon the Constitution, have added to the powers of the Government and have incorporated these powers into the legislation of the country, and that he is unwilling to restrict or interfere with them; in a word, that in the course of the administration of the Government for the last fifteen years there have been perpetrated offenses which we believe to be unconstitutional. Yet he says those acts are so interwoven in the legislation of the country that they ought not now to be interfered with. Now I protest, in the name of the State I have the honor in part to represent, against the doctrines my colleague has laid down in this part of his speech.

The Constitution of our fathers is as binding upon us to-day as it was upon them the day it came from their hands. There is not a single provision incorporated in it that is not binding upon us now, and did I for a moment believe that the Constitution prevented this appropriation I would be the last man to sustain it. But happily I am relieved from all doubts upon that question.

I am not willing to accede to the doctrine that all the claims that have been made in behalf of the General Government during the past fifteen or sixteen years, that all the usurpations and arrogations of power, whether incorporated in laws passed by Congress or not, are so far binding upon the people of this country that they cannot even move for their repeal. I believe that the better days of the Republic may yet return. I believe that those of our friends on this side of the House who are strict constructionists of the Constitution are not so far wrong, even according to the precedents which have been set, but that they will have cause to rejoice and to congratulate themselves within perhaps another decade upon the fact that their opinions of the provisions of the Constitution have again given tone and character to the practice of the Government.

But, aside from these considerations, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to believe that Maryland, if not united upon this floor, is at least at home unanimous in behalf of the centennial celebration and in favor of this appropriation.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would not have contributed to the lengthening of this debate had it not been that two of my colleagues from Pennsylvania, one from Chambersburg [Mr. STENGER] and the other from Allegheny, [Mr. COCHRANE,] while in favor of all the objects for which this appropriation is asked, have been unable, on account of constitutional scruples, to give this bill their support. I do not want it understood that the position they have taken corresponds in any large degree with the sentiment of the people of Pennsylvania.

On the contrary, I am perfectly satisfied that the great mass of the people of that Commonwealth have no doubt, no hesitation, as to the constitutionality and propriety of the appropriation demanded. My colleagues are unable to find any clause among the enumerated powers in the Constitution whereby an appropriation of this kind can be constitutionally made, neither are they able to find it under any of the implied or auxiliary powers of Congress.

The object of the Constitution, as we are told in the preamble, was, among other things, "to insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense," "promote the general welfare," and "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." And when the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution was under debate in the convention there was a great contrariety of opinion as to the extent of power that was to be found in the first clause of that section. Now, it has been decided on various occasions that the granting of power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises is a substantive power, and that the next clause following it, namely, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," is only one of the objects for which taxation was to be carried out, and was not of itself a substantive power.

It was contended by the strict constructionists of the Constitution that that portion which allowed Congress to levy taxes in order to provide for the common defense and general welfare applied only to those matters which are mentioned in the enumerated powers. But the better opinion is, as has been shown repeatedly, that you may go beyond the enumerated powers whenever you conclude that a tax to be laid is for the common defense and general welfare. Turning to the Commentaries of Justice Story on the Constitution, with regard to that particular clause we find him saying:

But, then, it is said if Congress may lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare, the money may be appropriated for those purposes, although not within the scope of the other enumerated powers. Certainly it may be so appropriated; for if Congress is authorized to lay taxes for such purposes, it would be strange if when raised the money could not be applied to them. That would be to give a power for a certain end and then deny the end intended by the power.

In continuing his comments upon this clause, he says:

If there are no other cases which concern the common defense and general welfare except those within the scope of the other enumerated powers, the discussion is merely nominal and frivolous. If there are such cases, who is at liberty to say that, being for the common defense and general welfare, the Constitution did not intend to embrace them? The preamble of the Constitution declares one of the objects to be to provide for the common defense and to promote the general welfare; and if the power to lay taxes is in express terms given to provide for the common defense and general welfare, what ground can there be to construe the power short of the object? To say that it shall be merely auxiliary to other enumerated powers and not co-extensive with its own terms and its avowed objects? One of the best established rules of interpretation, one which common sense and reason forbid us to overlook, is that when the object of a power is clearly defined by its terms or avowed in the context it ought to be construed so as to obtain the object and not to defeat it.

The question as to the construction of the power of Congress under that clause of the Constitution giving Congress power to levy taxes in order to provide for the general welfare came very strongly before Congress at the time of the Louisiana purchase, and was the subject of much earnest discussion by the best men of that day, some of whom, I believe, had participated in the formation of the Constitution.

The Constitution contains no enumerated power whereby the Congress of the United States can purchase territory; and when the question as to the acquisition of territory larger than all the rest of the Union as it existed after the treaty of peace of 1783 was before Congress it was denied, as it has been denied here to-day, that Congress had any power to appropriate money for such an object. Even Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, and James Madison doubted the constitutional power. But when the subject came to be thoroughly discussed it was found to be fairly included under the power of levying taxes in order to provide for the common defense and general welfare. In treating of this question in his Commentaries on the Constitution, Judge Story arrived at the same conclusion which the Congress of the United States had adopted. He says:

In regard to the acquisition of Louisiana: The treaty of 1803 contains a cession of the whole of that vast territory by France to the United States for a sum exceeding $11,000,000. There is a stipulation in the treaty on the part of the United States that the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States.

The objections urged were:

There is no pretense that the purchase or cession of any foreign territory is within any of the powers expressly enumerated in the Constitution. It is nowhere in that instrument said that Congress or any other department of the National Government shall have a right to purchase or accept of any cession of foreign territory. The power itself (it has been said) could scarcely have been in the contemplation of the framers of it. It is in its own nature as dangerous to liberty, as susceptible of abuse in its actual application, and as likely as any which could be imagined to lead to dissolution of the Union. If Congress have the power, it may unite any foreign territory whatsoever to our own, however distant, however populous, and however powerful. Under the form of a cession we may become united to a more powerful neighbor or rival, and be involved in European or other foreign interests and contests to an interminable extent. An if there may be a stipulation for the admission of foreign states into the Union, the whole balance of the Constitution may be destroyed and the old States sunk into utter insignificance.

* * * * * * *

In regard to the appropriation of money for the purposes of the cession the case is still stronger. If no appropriation of money can be made except for cases within enumerated powers, (and this clearly is not one,) how can the enormous sum of eleven millions be justified for this object?

The strict constructionists of that day were as ingenious as those of the present in finding objections to any power of however great national import that could not be found among the enumerated powers in the Constitution. They acknowledged no implied nor auxiliary powers, but sought to keep the Government down to the naked text of that instrument. In speaking of their arguments above given Judge Story says:

Such were the objections which have been, and in fact may be, urged against the cession and the appropriations made to carry the treaty into effect. The friends of the measure were driven to the adoption of the doctrine that the right to acquire territory was incident to national sovereignty; that it was a resulting power, growing necessarily out of the aggregate powers confided by the Federal Constitution; that the appropriation might justly be vindicated upon this ground, and also upon the ground that it was for the common defense and general welfare. In short, there is no possibility of defending the constitutionality of this measure but upon the principles of the liberal construction which has been upon other occasions so earnestly resisted.

He goes on to say:

The more recent acquisition of Florida, which has been universally approved or acquiesced in by all the States, can be maintained only on the same principles, and furnishes a striking illustration of the truth that constitutions of government require a liberal construction to effect their objects, and that a narrow interpretation of their powers, however it may suit the views of speculative philosophers or the accidental interests of political parties, is incompatible with the permanent interests of the state and subversive of the great ends of all government, the safety and independence of the people.

Mr. Chairman, it is said that it is a rule of law that precedents should be followed unless they be manifestly unjust; and the levying of taxes and the appropriation of money for the general welfare has so many precedents that it is impossible for us to doubt that it is among the implied and auxiliary powers of the Government, the views of the "speculative philosophers" of the present day or "the accidental interests of political parties" to the contrary notwithstanding.

The same principle upon which the purchase of Louisiana was made, precisely the same doctrine upon which the Congress of the United States appropriated millions of money for the purchase of that territory, was re-iterated and acknowledged in the purchase of Florida. It was again recognized in the Gadsden purchase from Mexico. More recently the power of Congress to make such an appropriation was acknowledged in the purchase of Alaska, a territory not contiguous to our soil, but separated from it by the British possessions.

If there be no such power as that in Congress; if a great nation has no authority to make appropriations of this character; if it is to be held down to the enumerated powers in the Constitution, then you strip the Government of every power to make appropriations except where it may be of the merest and strictest necessity. You take away from Congress the right to purchase anything beyond what is absolutely necessary to carry on the Government. You strike down at once the right to erect the glorious porticoes which stand in front of the two Houses of Congress and the magnificent monolithic columns of the new wings of the Treasury. You haul down the national flag which, Mr. Chairman, hangs above your head. You wipe out all the pictures which adorn these walls and those in the Rotunda which illustrate our national history. You throw out the busts which are in the Supreme Court chamber. You unhinge the bronze doors at the eastern entrances of the Capitol. You strip the Government of everything except that which is required for the merest necessities of the nation. Under such an interpretation of the Constitution this glorious edifice in which the nation takes such pride, and which is the equal of any legislative building in the world, would be nothing but the plainest barrack-like building of brick and mortar.

Why, sir, this principle has been followed time and again. We gave a donation to Lafayette of money and of land, for which there is no authority granted in the Constitution of the United States among the enumerated powers, and it is only to be found by implication. There was no enumerated power to create a congressional cemetery. There was no enumerated power to make the appropriation for Morse's telegraph, to give him $30,000 to try the experiment which eventually succeeded and which has benefited the commerce of the country to the extent of thousands of millions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, even the gentlemen from my State who spoke against the bill acknowledged the power yesterday when they voted for an appropriation of money to Judge McCandless. They acknowledged there was an implied right in the Constitution authorizing Congress to make such an appropriation. It is not to be found in any of the enumerated powers. It cannot be deduced from the article establishing the judiciary. It was a donation pure and simple, and untrammeled by any conditions whatever. The government was under no obligation to make the grant to Judge McCandless, it had fulfilled its contract with him; yet for his great services in the cause of the country as an eminent jurist Congress granted the pension. It was a deed worthy of a great nation, and I rejoice that it was done and that my colleagues voted for it; but under their narrow construction of the Constitution their votes and their arguments will be entirely inconsistent with each other.

I may add that the pensions of the soldiers of the revolutionary war also come within the same category None of these things could you effect under the Constitution as construed by gentlemen on the other side of the House. Under the argument of my colleague from Pennsylvania you could not even have established the Department of Agriculture, in which half of the working-people of the country are directly interested.

I find sufficient authority in the same clauses that empower Congress "to levy taxes in order to provide for the general welfare," and under which the great appropriations heretofore mentioned were made, for the passage of this bill.

It is the duty of our Government to provide for the public tranquillity, common defense, and general welfare of its people. This was one of the declared objects of its creation. There is no higher obligation can be imposed upon it. As there are many ways of doing it, the Constitution has wisely left the matter to congressional discretion, and authorized it to enact all laws that may be necessary and proper to the performance of that duty.

What the general welfare may be is nowhere defined in the Constitution. Congress, which is the representative of the people's wishes, sits here annually to judge of and act for the welfare of the people. It must exercise its own judgment and discretion thereon. It has been repeatedly so decided.

Acting, then, under these principles, as laid down in Story's Commentaries, the question of this appropriation is not a question of constitutional power, but of propriety, expediency, and necessity, of the extent of all which Congress, under the restrictions of the Constitution, is the judge.

If, then, Congress should conclude that it would be to the general welfare of the people that we should celebrate the centennial birthday of the nation by a grand exhibition of all the productions of American genius and industry, concentrated in a single and convenient place, say at Philadelphia, the birthplace of the nation, where all who should choose might see the various objects of art and industry and the means and appliances whereby their comfort and happiness and welfare could be promoted, and where by such exhibition new thoughts and new ideas could be disseminated through the mass and made available for their benefit, and whereby the people from the North and the South, from the East and the West, could be brought together in one common brotherhood, and a more national and fraternal feeling among them engendered and domestic tranquillity secured, it has the constitutional power, under the interpretation given to the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, to create such an exhibition or to aid in its establishment.

It is under these principles, repeatedly recognized by the people, that Congress has repeatedly made appropriations for the purchase of great territories, busts, statues, pictures, and other works of art; that it has caused embellishments to be added to public buildings and grounds that were not necessary in the strictest sense; that it has ordered salaries to be paid to the representatives of deceased officers of Government; that it has established a congressional cemetery, and made many similar appropriations whose constitutionality has never been questioned.

Being, then, a matter over which the Congress has the right to exercise a just discretion, I have no doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to pass the bill, and, believing it conducive to the general welfare as contemplated in the Constitution, I shall therefore give it my hearty support.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. THOMPSON obtained the floor, and yielded to

Mr. HOPKINS, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOOD, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to give notice that on Tuesday next at three o'clock I propose to call the previous question on the centennial bill.

MRS. MARY WATTS.

On motion of Mr. DARRALL, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Mrs. Mary Watts, of New Orleans, no adverse report having been made.

ISRAEL YOUNT.

On motion of Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House the papers in the case of Israel Yount, no adverse report having been made.

ELIZABETH TIPTON WINFORD AND MARY E. SHELTON.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Elizabeth Tipton Winford and Mary E. Shelton, no adverse report having been made.

Mr. DURAND, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, on account of important business, for one week from January 20.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. PHELPS. I have to request that on account of insufficient health I be excused from further service on the Committee for the District of Columbia.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints, to fill the vacancy thus made, the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. HARDENBERGH.

ARRANGEMENTS OF THE HALL.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before putting to the House the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to say that he holds in his hand a request, signed by numerous members, that the doorkeepers shall be allowed to erect a temporary rail around the outer border of the seats, for the purpose of better protecting the members against the intrusion of outsiders. Does the Chair hear any objection to granting that request?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that I am informed that that experiment has been tried two or three times before and has always failed.

Mr. COX. It has been tried in the Senate and has failed there.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The Speaker will permit me to say that, if the rules were enforced properly, members would not be interfered with by the outsiders who have no right to the floor, but are permitted to come into the lobby and into the Hall and to annoy us there and here. Everybody comes in ad libitum, and every doorkeeper, in my judgment, is derelict in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that the difficulty is in the circumstance that the doorkeepers have not yet become sufficiently acquainted with the members and ex-members. I do not think the doorkeepers are to blame to the extent implied by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I know what I say to be true. Any man who pleases can get in upon this floor.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make one suggestion, having had some little experience here, that if it were made the absolute duty of the doorkeepers, or of some one of the doorkeepers, without waiting for the call of the Speaker or of a member, whenever he observed any person standing up in the rear of the seats, to make him sit down or move away—if that were made the absolute duty of one of the officers of the House, it would tend more than anything else to promote the order of the House.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I desire to say a word or two upon this matter. It is the custom of members of the House to come here in the morning, many of them, from ten to twelve o'clock to receive their mail and do their correspondence; but on the outside tier of seats that is an impossibility, particularly from half past eleven to twelve, when a dozen people are crowding around you overlooking your letters, some of them taking away the papers from your desk. Every other seat in the House has some barriers which outsiders cannot pass, and unless we have some protection afforded us it is an utter impossibility for us to do our correspondence at that time, and the consequence is that it has to be done during the hours devoted to business here, which makes more confusion then. For that reason, if for no other, we ask that some safeguard of this kind be provided.

Mr. SAYLER. I am a resident of the suburbs also, and appreciate the difficulty. I doubt very much, however, whether this proposition will meet the difficulty. For the first time now, having had a good seat during the last session and a bad one this, I am in favor of taking these desks down, and would be in favor of the proposition to seat the members on benches so that they should be brought within reach of one another. This system of reading newspapers and writing letters and putting our royal feet on the desks of the House I think is a great mistake; and I think that we in the background certainly need some protection.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Are you not in favor of the proposition to rail in the background?

Mr. SAYLER. I would be in favor of a railing, but I do not think it would accomplish the object to any great extent. I think the desks should be taken out, and I make that request that it be ordered by unanimous consent that the desks be taken out and that we be seated on benches.

Mr. KELLEY. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a suggestion. I think those of us who had the experience of the benches, especially considering that the House has now grown to its present magnitude of two hundred and ninety-two members, would willingly indorse the proposition that the sitting on benches, throwing the members together into a comparatively small space, is better than the present arrangement. There is a difficulty in that case about drawing up amendments and other propositions for the action of the House during the progress of business, but with tables at each corner, as then, easy of access, I think there will be no real difficulty encountered on that score.

Mr. COX. I dissent from my friend altogether.

Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman from New York has a good seat, and of course dissents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say, before this informal conversation is terminated, that for many days past he has heard many complaints about the confusion, most unnecessary and very annoying, upon the outskirts of the House, and that that confusion has been caused by persons who have no right to be upon the floor under the rules, but who by some means or other do gain access to the floor. Now, the Chair is very frank in saying that he knows of but one way in which he can cure this evil, and that is for him to cease absolutely to give permits to the floor to anybody, and then for all the members of the House to cease going to the doorkeepers and bringing in their friends. Now, if the House is willing that this course shall be pursued the Chair is, and then we will have peace. We will thus absolutely exclude from this Hall everybody, except a small number of persons who are entitled under the rules to be here.

Mr. COX. The rules are already adequate for this purpose.

The SPEAKER. The rules are adequate now.

Mr. COX. Except as to ex-members.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair the rules are entirely adequate now if faithfully obeyed and carried out.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I approve very much of the remarks of the Speaker. I am willing for one not to violate the rules in any respect whatsoever; and I desire now to make another suggestion. I come here in the morning sometimes half an hour and sometimes an hour before the House meets, and I find it almost impossible to get to my seat for the crowds of all sorts who crowd the floor. I would like to know in whose possession the floor of the House is before the meeting of the House. If it be under the control of the Doorkeeper of the House, I think he ought to discriminate, and only admit certain people. The crowding of the floor at that time is a crying nuisance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels no hesitation in replying to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky that he believes it is competent for the Chair to direct that the Hall shall be cleared at eleven o'clock if it be the desire of the House, so that members who come in at that time may be protected from intrusion.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the floor be cleared fifteen minutes before the meeting of the House. The public like to come in here before the House meets, and we ought not to limit their privilege.

Mr. HOSKINS. With all due deference to the Speaker, I think that no resolution ought to be so construed that the Speaker shall not have the privilege in his own good judgment to admit any one to the floor of the House whom he desires to admit; and for my own part I think the Hall ought to be open until the session of the House commences. We have constituents and friends who come here to visit the Hall and like to remain here until the hour of meeting. And it strikes me that it ought to be open until that time. There is only one way in which to enforce the rules of the House, and that is for the Chair to tell those having the matter in charge to carry out the rules of the House fully. I believe that the Presiding Officer ought to have the right to invite upon the floor of the House any one he sees fit. And I believe that my constituents ought to be permitted to roam through this Hall before the House is in session. There will be no difficulty in enforcing the rules when these new doorkeepers have become familiar with the face of every member of Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I agree with the gentleman as to the Speaker's right to admit persons to the floor of the House; but let the floor be cleared half an hour before the House meets.

Mr. HOSKINS. Just one word in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky. No one on earth can tell when the people from my district desire to come here. They may come here within half an hour before the House meets. Let me say further that it was my bad fortune to have an exceedingly poor seat in the last Congress, and I know that there is some necessity for the protection of members from intrusion.

Mr. COX. I desire to say in behalf of the Doorkeeper, and I think I may say of the Speaker and of the members of the House, that the fault of the bringing of persons upon the floor of the House lies with the members of the House.

Mr. FORT. Certainly we do it. As I am in the interior, I have really no concern about this matter, but if gentlemen occupying outer seats desire a railing, I see no objection to it.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Would a motion now be in order?

The SPEAKER. The whole of this proceeding is informal and by unanimous consent. What does the gentleman desire to suggest?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I was going to bring the House to some sort of a decision by a motion that the Speaker direct that the Hall be cleared thirty minutes before the meeting of Congress.

Mr. WHITE. With the members who occupy seats in the inside of this House everything goes on comfortably. For myself, I am not so situated. I am a new member, and I would like to hear everything and I would like to learn. My seat, unfortunately, is on the extreme borders of the Chamber, and it seems to me that these desks should be pushed back and a railing put up or a screen, such as there is now before the doors, and let each member have a desk as he has now. But it would be a great deal better that the chairs should be in front, so that we should be together and all of us be able to hear what is going on. I would like to make a motion that the desks be removed to the borders and the chairs brought to the front. For my own part, I have to read each day in the RECORD to learn what I should have learned the preceding day.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say a word calling attention to another matter. I sit in the rear of the House, and have had the misfortune to get several severe colds in consequence of the draughts which fall upon us from the lobbies. In regard to this matter of the railing I do not feel any preference, for I presume the railing would be a nuisance. But I have this to say: that I think it is right that all doors opening into the lobbies and cloak-rooms should be protected with screens like the one in front of the central door. There is a constant and severe draught whenever there is any air moving at all in this Chamber, which is a serious danger to life; and I hope the Doorkeeper will be required to place screens in front of those doors which lead into the lobbies.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask some gentleman on the other side of the House, perhaps the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] what authority there is in the Constitution to enable us to make an appropriation to provide for luxuries at the expense of the dear people? What provision of the Constitution gives us that power?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say, before the motion to adjourn is put, that so far as he is concerned in reference to the issue of permits to the floor he is very careful, and has issued but few, and only in cases when the gentlemen seeking admission have been highly commended by gentlemen of the House.

The regular order is the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SAYLER. I desire to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to, and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Adam Berg, for additional bounty, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, resolutions of the Board of Cotton Exchange of Cincinnati, Ohio, asking for the passage of a bill appropriating $1,500,000 to the centennial celebration, to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the proposed National Census of 1875.

By Mr. COLLINS: The petition of workmen employed on the Capitol grounds by Clarke, architect, for additional pay, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. FELTON: Papers relating to the claim of William N. Garmany, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HENKLE: The petition of Thomas W. Gough, for pay for property used and destroyed by the United States Army, to the same committee.

By Mr. HOPKINS: The petition of ladies of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, in favor of granting aid to the centennial celebration, to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the proposed National Census of 1875.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition, with accompanying papers, of Sewall B. Corbett, for pay for property used and occupied by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KASSON: The petition of 9 citizens of Ohio, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. McCRARY: Papers relating to the claim of Lieutenant C. T. Martin, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McFARLAND: The petition of W. K. Yost, for the commissioners of claims to be authorized to re-examine his claim, to the same committee.

By Mr. MONEY: Papers relating to the claim of Allen White, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OLIVER: The petition of Elizabeth Gillock, for rent and damages for property used by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. PACKER: The petition of Daniel Bishop, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PHELPS: The petition of John Reiman and other citizens of Connecticut, for the passage of a law making greenbacks receivable at par for duties on imports, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, the petition of H. B. Sturgis and others, of New Haven, Connecticut, for the repeal of the act fixing a time for a resumption of specie payments, and for the issue by the Government of 3.65 convertible gold-bearing bonds, to the same committee.

By Mr. RAINEY: Papers in the case of Walter D. Plowden, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, that aid be extended the Southern Pacific Railroad, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. SAYLER: The petition of Thomas W. Collins, Wilson D. Haven, Henry J. Davison, C. D. Willard, John C. Parker, George W. Cissel, and Benjamin F. Morsell, for the incorporation of the Oxygen Gas Company of the District of Columbia, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SEELYE: The petitions of the Methodist Episcopal church of Lynn, Massachusetts; of the First Congregational church at Chelsea, Massachusetts; of the Congregational church at Lawrence, Massachusetts, signed by their several pastors and officers, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of the Massachusetts Temperance Alliance, signed by Rev. A. A. Miner, D. D., president, and Rev. William M. Thayre, secretary, that no appropriation be made to the centennial celebration at Philadelphia if any of the grounds or buildings are to be used for the sale of intoxicating liquors, to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the proposed National Census of 1875.

By Mr. TARBOX: The petition of A. P. Ordway and other citizens of Massachusetts, for the repeal of the proprietary stamp tax, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. TURNEY: The petition of citizens of Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, for post-route No. 2991 to be extended to the village of Bouquette, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of citizens of Westmoreland and Allegheny Counties, Pennsylvania, for a post-route from Parnassus to Hamilton's Mill, in Westmoreland County, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of Fayette and Greene Counties, Pennsylvania, for daily mail service on route No. 3009, between Smithfield and Greensborough, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, for a change and division of mail-route No. 8614 by establishing a post-route from Paulton to Delmont, also from Leechburgh to Markee, to the same committee.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: The petition of citizens of North Carolina, for a post-route from Micaville to the three forks of South Ton River, to the same committee.

By Mr. WADDELL: Papers relating to the claims of Armand D. Young, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi: Papers relating to the claims of J. C. Julian, R. O. Woodson, James A. Grier, Patrick McDermot, and W. W. Clayton, for property taken and used by the United States Army, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIS: The petition of Peter Cooper, H. H. Van Dyck, and others, for the passage of an act authorizing the President to appoint Walton Cable master in the United States Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WOOD, of New York: The petition of importers of New York, for a change in the manner of assessing duties on imported green fruit, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of importing merchants of New York, for the correction of the errors of the Revised Statutes in the imposition of duties, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of florists of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the practice of distributing flowers and plants in the District of Columbia gratuitously by the commissioners of public buildings and grounds, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 24, 1876.

Mr. JOHN P. JONES, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUYDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year 1875; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of January 6, 1876, information in relation to the harbor of Charlevoix, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present quite a number of petitions—ten at least—of citizens of Ashtabula County and other parts of the State of Ohio, similar in character to those that have been presented heretofore, praying the Congress of the United States to give aid by bonds to the construction of what is known as the Texas Pacific Railway. I move their reference to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present the petition of Mrs. Eunice Tripler, widow of the late Charles S. Tripler, a surgeon in the Army, praying for a pension. The lady has not signed this petition, but it is in her handwriting and her name appears in front of it, and it is accompanied by a letter with her signature, and I know it to be her own. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM presented three petitions of citizens of Columbia County, Wisconsin, praying for the speedy completion of the Fox River improvement and for the construction of an ample canal along the bank of the Wisconsin River from Portage City, Wisconsin, to Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi River: which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALLACE presented four petitions of citizens of Westmoreland County, and five petitions signed by 300 citizens of the fifth congressional district of Pennsylvania, praying for Government aid in the construction and completion of the Texas Pacific Railway and the prostrated iron industries of Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a mass-meeting of citizens of Danville, Montour County, Pennsylvania, in favor of granting aid in the construction and completion of the Texas Pacific Railway; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MAXEY. I present the petition of Michael Mayers, of Paris, Lamar County, Texas, praying compensation for drugs and medicines furnished the Army of the United States during the late war. He was formerly of Fort Smith, Arkansas, where these drugs and medicines were furnished. In connection with this matter I desire to say that his claim was referred to the southern claims commission, but was rejected by it on account of insufficient proof of loyalty. He now desires to have it referred to the Committee on Claims, in order that he may introduce the necessary proof to establish his loyalty and the justice of his claim. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present two petitions of citizens of California, asking Congress to take early action in repealing the two-cent United States check-stamp tax, which they say is alike obnoxious to the banks, to their customers, and to the people of the United States. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented the memorial of the Boston Society of Civil Engineers, praying that Congress enact a law providing that after some date, to be fixed several years in advance, the metric standards in the office of weights and measures at Washington, District of Columbia, shall be the sole authorized public standard of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of George Hibben, for Hibben & Co., praying to have refunded certain taxes assessed and collected on tobacco wrongfully, as alleged; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented the petition of Lyon & Son and 44 other citizens of Michigan, praying for the repeal of the two-cent United States stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I also present the memorial of D. M. Ferry & Co. and 97 other citizens and firms of Detroit, Michigan, remonstrating against a further appropriation for the distribution of seeds from the Agricultural Bureau at the public expense. I will say that I do not concur in this memorial, but I move its reference to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of citizens of Danville, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to grant aid in the construction and completion of the Texas Pacific Railway; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented the memorial of the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association, of Philadelphia, protesting against permitting vessels built abroad being registered as American vessels and participating in our coasting trade, as proposed in House bill No. 523, now pending; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am also requested to present the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Danville, Montour County, State of Pennsylvania, who urge Congress to grant a subsidy to the Texas Pacific Railroad by indorsing its bonds. I ask that the paper may be read and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there is now pending before Congress a bill to aid the Texas Pacific Railroad Company in the construction of their road in the form of a guarantee by the United States Government of 5 per cent. interest on the bonds to be issued by the company for the construction of said road, under conditions assuring security to the Government and success to the enterprise; and whereas the completion of the Texas Pacific Road, connecting ocean and ocean over the southwestern portion of the United States, will greatly shorten the distance and cheapen the carriage between the ports of the two oceans and in its thorough exemption from snow-blockades or other winter obstructions, affording a line of transportation at all times reliable for the commercial, postal, and military demands of the nation, enabling prompt concentration of armies and their supplies whenever and wherever required for the country's safety and defense, and directly promoting honest labor and public economy, carrying forward a self-sustaining column of emigration for the development of the vast resources of wealth which traverse the entire line of said route; and whereas the construction of said road seems to be required by the necessities of the times and the highest consideration of justice, patriotism, and public policy; and whereas it will give employment to tens of thousands of laborers now idle, give a new impetus to the suspended and prostrate industries of the country, and distribute millions of foreign capital secured at a low rate of interest: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the citizens of Montour County, Pennsylvania, in mass convention at Danville, assembled—

First. That in the judgment of this meeting it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to pass a clear, explicit, and securely guarded law authorizing a loan of the credit of the National Government to the Texas Pacific Railway Company to the extent of the guaranteeing of the interest on the bonds issued for the construction of said road on such terms and conditions as shall indemnify the Government against loss;

Second. That we firmly believe that a loan of credit must go a great way toward the restoration of general confidence and the revival of the various industries of the country now in such a prostrate condition; and,

Third. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are earnestly requested to use all honorable means to the extent of their utmost abilities toward securing the passing of a law proposing guarantee by the General Government of interest on the bonds for the construction of the Texas Pacific Railway, and that a copy of these resolutions be officially transmitted to each of them.

R. S. SIMINGTON, President.

Attest:

WILL. G. KRAMER and others, Secretaries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. BOGY. I move that the paper just read be printed. It is not necessary to print the names; they can be excluded.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD presented the petition of Gallus Kerchner, of North Vernon, Indiana, praying compensation for stone delivered for the construction of the United States arsenal at Indianapolis, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to present a memorial which is addressed to the Joint Library Committee. It is signed by John A. Dix, S. J. Tilden, and several other gentlemen of distinction, and commends to Congress the purchase of a picture painted in 1822 by the late Professor Morse, the subject of which is the House of Representatives at that time. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of James J. Ritch, of Scott County, Mississippi, praying for compensation for property and supplies taken by the United States Army in 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Caims.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of Reuben S. Denny, of Kentucky, praying compensation for property destroyed by the military forces of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. I hold in my hand a communication from the Legislature of the State of Alabama, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama desires to have a communication read. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be read for information.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 24, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have been commissioned by his excellency the governor of the State of Alabama, in compliance with a joint resolution of the General Assembly of said State, adopted on the 20th instant, to present to the Senate of the United States of America the memorial of the said General Assembly of Alabama, "in regard to the alleged election of GEORGE E. SPENCER as United States Senator," together with the printed documents containing the evidence taken in relation to said matter before a joint committee of the two houses of the said General Assembly of Alabama and the report of the said committee thereon

In the discharge of my duty, by virtue of the said commission, I hand you herewith duly-authenticated copies of the said memorial, evidence, and report, together with my commission and the resolution under which the same was issued, and ask that they may be submitted to the Senate of the United States in accordance with my said instructions.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH F. JOHNSTON.

HON. GEORGE GOLDTHWAITE,
United States Senator.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. I now present the papers referred to in the letter, and move that the accompanying documents and the letter just read be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 168) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Schwartz, deceased, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Pilmer, late of Company H, Ninth Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, praying to have the charge of desertion removed and that he be allowed his pay and allowances, withheld on account of the charge, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs have instructed me to report back the bill (S. No. 252) donating the military road running from Astoria, Oregon, to Salem, in that State, to the several counties through which it passes. I desire to say in this connection that the road was surveyed and the construction of it completed under the direction of the Secretary of War, pursuant to acts of Congress passed in 1855, 1857, and 1858. Its use by the military authorities of the United States has long since ceased. The Chief of Engineers, General Humphreys, the Secretary of War, and General Howard, the commanding general of the department, report that this road is no longer necessary for military purposes. The governor of Oregon and the Secretary of War ask that Congress relinquish this road to the counties through which it passes for a public road, hereafter to be used under the control of these counties. The Committee on Military Affairs recommend that the Senate approve this bill which has been referred to them and is now reported back favorably. I suppose there will be no objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the Senator will give way to morning business, he can call up the bill afterward.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 60) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts approved July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 14) to extend the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, reported it with sundry amendments; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 254) granting a pension to Frank Kendrick, submitted an adverse report thereon.

S. K. THOMPSON.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 160) for the relief of S. K. Thompson, to report it with an amendment. I desire to say that this bill was before the Senate at the last session, was passed by the Senate on the last day of the session, but failed to receive action or consideration in the House of Representatives, I suppose on account of the want of time. Some papers have been submitted in this case since then which strengthen it very much, and there is a report of the committee accompanying it. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks for the present consideration of a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

No objection being made, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By it the President is authorized and directed to appoint Samuel K. Thompson to the rank of second lieutenant in the Army, with benefits of and credit for length of service as a commissioned officer in the Army prior to August 10, 1874.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 3 to strike out the words "and directed," so as to read, "That the President is hereby authorized to appoint Samuel K. Thompson," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think the bill had better lie over. I do not understand it.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator from Pennsylvania probably has forgotten that the committee authorized me this morning to ask for the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was not present at the committee meeting.

Mr. CLAYTON. As I said before, this bill passed the Senate at the last session on the last day of the session, and failed in the House for the want of time, I suppose. The evidence which has been laid before the committee since then only makes the case stronger. The last portion of the bill, which authorizes the recipient to be allowed the benefits of service, only applies to his time of service before his discharge from the Army.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator to state the circumstances which make this a case so peculiar as to justify the passage of a law in regard to the restoration of one who has been dismissed from the Army.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is a written report which had probably better be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 160) for the relief of S. K. Thompson, late second lieutenant Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

That they find that the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-third Congress submitted a report in this case February 23, 1875, of which the following is a copy:

"This officer was tried by court-martial in June, 1874, and sentenced to be cashiered. The court consisted of seven members, one of whom was allowed to act as counsel for the defendant; a proceeding admitted by all who have examined the case to be irregular. Four of the court afterward recommended Thompson to the clemency of the reviewing authority.

"Your committee have examined the court-martial proceedings, and find the evidence to be contradictory, and much of it of a circumstantial nature; that the papers and affidavits filed by Thompson effectually disprove much of the evidence given before the court; and your committee can but think that if sufficient time had been allowed this officer to furnish the evidence to the court that has been placed before this committee, the findings of that court would have been entirely different.

"Lieutenant Thompson had been in continuous service in the Army from the commencement of the late war, and had been promoted from the ranks for gallant and meritorious conduct, and at the close of the war was appointed a lieutenant in the Regular Army. He furnishes testimonials from a great many officers with whom he served, all speaking of him in the highest terms. No charge was ever brought against him until this for which he was tried.

"In view of all the circumstances, your committee are of the opinion that Lieutenant Thompson is entitled to relief, and therefore report back the bill with amendments and recommend its passage."

In this report and its recommendation your committee fully concur, and recommend the passage of the bill now under consideration with an amendment.

Mr. WEST. I take the action of the committee as demonstrated by their report to be that of a reviewing authority correcting an erroneous sentence by a court-martial. Is that the case?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is substantially the case in the light of subsequent testimony.

Mr. WEST. In other words, the committee reviews the action of a court-martial, and re-instates this officer to his position in the Army?

Mr. CLAYTON. The bill authorizes the President to appoint him.

Mr. WEST. Yes; "with benefits of, and credit for, length of service."

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. I can understand very readily how this officer might be restored to a credit for length of service; in other words, that his commission should date back; but I would like to ask the Senator whether it is the intention of the committee that this man shall be paid for the time he was out of service?

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Senator will read the bill, he will see that it does not provide pay for that time. It only gives him the benefit of service actually performed.

Mr. WEST. "With benefits of, and credit for, length of service."

Mr. CLAYTON. I will state to the Senator from Louisiana what the effect of it is. Under the law every officer is allowed for ten years' service an additional ration. This man served several years before he was discharged, and this bill only allows him credit for that service actually performed. It allows him no credit for the interval when he was out of service, and gives him no pay for that time.

Mr. WEST. The bill does not say so.

Mr. CLAYTON. Put that there, if you choose: but it is not necessary for it to say so. The bill is very plain on its face. It simply authorizes the President to appoint this man to the rank of second lieutenant, and, in addition to that, gives him credit for the service he actually performed before he was discharged from the Army.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator from Arkansas will allow me, I suggest that he insert after the word "credit" the words "without pay."

Mr. CLAYTON. I am perfectly willing that any Senator should put in any amendment that he thinks will make the construction more clear.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that there is no objection to the amendment, but the bill cannot possibly be construed to authorize him to receive pay for that time. The Senator from Vermont will remember that, under the law in reference to the organization of the Army, each officer is allowed credit for the time he serves. To illustrate: Suppose an officer served five years during the war in the regular Army; he was then mustered out, and was out of the service for five years; he was after that time re-appointed to the Army; the five years he served during the war in the regular Army are added to his service since, not for pay, because he has already got his pay, but to show the length of time he has been in service in the Army of the United States, because so many years' service in the Army allows him an additional ration. That is what it means; it means nothing more, nothing less. That provision of the bill is only to add the service that has already been performed to what service he may perform hereafter. He has been paid for his service, and hence it could not apply to pay at all, but only to the length of service that he may have performed in the Army.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I supposed that the bill meant nothing more than that; but the words I have suggested will certainly do no harm.

Mr. LOGAN. When I come to reflect for a moment, though I shall not object to the amendment, I fear it might do harm in this way: If you say "without pay" it might be construed when his ten years of service expire that they would not give him the extra ration.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Suppose you say "credit in rank."

Mr. LOGAN. That is what it does say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; it says "credit."

Mr. LOGAN. "Credit in rank" or "credit for time of service" makes no difference.

Mr. WEST. Say "without pay for the time in which he was suspended."

Mr. LOGAN. If Senators will consider the language of the bill, they will see it means that and nothing else. It cannot possibly be construed to authorize any additional pay; but if Senators think otherwise, I have no objection to the bill being amended in that way or by adding a proviso: "Provided, That he shall be allowed no pay for the time he was out of service."

Mr. WEST. Evidently the intention of the committee and the desire of the Senate is to do this man justice, but not to do the Government of the United States injustice by paying a man for serving the country when he was not so serving it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. The bill in its own language says, "and credit for length of service as a commissioned officer in the Army prior to August 10, 1874," the date of his discharge.

Mr. WEST. It is very evident that there must be some ambiguity about the bill, or else the Senator and I would actually agree. All I want to do is to protect the Government against paying any man for services he did not render, and I move to insert:

Provided, That pay shall not be accorded to Lieutenant Thompson during the time that he was suspended from the service.

That will meet the case.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection in the world to that proviso going in, but I think it utterly useless, for the simple reason that this provides to do two things: First, to authorize the President to appoint this man to the Army. That does not carry back pay with it, certainly. Now, what is the next thing it does? The next thing is to allow him credit for the length of time he actually served before he was discharged; not since he was discharged, but before. Now, how can any one consider for a moment that that carries with it pay for the interval between his discharge from and restoration to the Army? But if Senators think it is absolutely necessary to protect the Government against injustice, I am perfectly willing to let the amendment be made.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to make an inquiry. Will not the effect of this bill be to restore to the Army an officer who has been tried by court-martial and dismissed from the Army?

Mr. CLAYTON. It authorizes the President to appoint him. It is a new appointment.

Mr. BOGY. It authorizes the President to appoint him, of course. Now, if that be so it destroys the effect of the court-martial. We have no means of investigating the case. It is true the appointment is to be made by the President, but it is an expression on the part of Congress that the action of the court was erroneous or that testimony has come to light since that day. We know nothing of that testimony. I say this, that officers of the Army are actuated by great and commendable esprit de corps; and, when an officer of the Army is tried by a court-martial and is dismissed from the service, I presume there are very few cases, if any, where that person should be restored again to the Army, because if there be any favor or affection to be shown it does exist in courts-martial from the fact that these persons belong to a court which is taken from the Army, and I, as a member of Congress, would not be disposed to place my vote against a judgment thus pronounced by a competent court-martial. I think the whole proceeding is of very doubtful expediency and propriety.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I to a certain extent agree with the Senator from Missouri; but to say that the proceedings of a court-martial shall not be reviewed is agreeing that a court-martial is an infallible body and can do no wrong. We might just as well say there should be no appeal from a jury to a higher authority. I know there are cases where courts-martial do injustice. It is very seldom that any report has ever been made from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Senate asking the restoration of an officer to the Army where he has been cashiered by order of a court-martial; but in this case I must say that I think great wrong was done to this young man. I presume there is no man who has ever served for any length of time in the Army but will agree with me that sometimes great wrong is done by a court-martial.

Now, to give a history of this case, this young man was ordered by his superior officer, being an infantry officer, to go on a scout. He took charge of a scouting party in pursuit of Indians. Being an infantry officer, he had no horse. He applied to the quartermaster, and the quartermaster furnished him with one of those mustang ponies that cannot be ridden or worked or anything else, and the pony threw him; and because the pony threw him he was charged with drunkenness and cashiered, when the evidence shows the charge to be totally false. There is the case.

Mr. CLAYTON. That was the only instance of his being charged with drunkenness.

Mr. LOGAN. That was the only instance of any allegation against him. I ask the Senator from Missouri whether he considers that that was a just judgment of a court-martial? If this officer had been cashiered for malpractice in the Army or for anything dishonorable or disgraceful, I would be the last man to be in favor of his restoration; but in this case I think he was outrageously treated, and that Congress would do wrong if they did not restore him. We do not restore him by this bill, however, and we do not even in the bill require the President to appoint him; but we give the President authority to appoint him. That is all. We have examined the case; the evidence was before the committee. I think it was an outrage upon this young man to cashier him for this alleged offense under the circumstances.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator from Illinois appeals to persons who have served in the Army. I served in the Army myself a great many years ago. Unlike my friend from Illinois, I was a private, while he was a very distinguished officer. But now, presuming all the alleged facts which he has stated to be true, were not all those facts brought before that court-martial? As a matter of course they were.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will state right here that the officer appealed to the court-martial for time to produce this testimony, but it was not allowed to him. Since that he has produced the testimony to the committee.

Mr. BOGY. Statements of this kind can be taken with the utmost allowance, and yet when fully examined amount to very little. I am not at all questioning the perfect truth of what the Senator from Illinois states. Nevertheless, we must presume that all these circumstances, all these facts, and everything pertaining to this subject were brought before that court-martial. The members of these courts-martial are intelligent officers, who have no disposition and no interest to find a man guilty, particularly a private. They are the protectors of their soldiers; they are the friends of the privates; and all the facts stated on this floor now must have been brought before that court-martial beyond a doubt. If we can review this case, why cannot we review the case of General Porter by Congress?

Mr. LOGAN. We can.

Mr. BOGY. We can; but I presume there is no possibility of doing it.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a possibility of it. General Porter's petition has been before half a dozen Congresses for a review of the case, and Congress has perfect authority to-day to review it.

Mr. BOGY. Does my friend favor the re-opening of that case for investigation?

Mr. LOGAN. That is another question. We are talking about the authority of Congress.

Mr. BOGY. I do not doubt, nor did I question the authority of Congress. I am only trying to advance this idea, that Congress is really not very competent to investigate subjects of this kind, and that these courts-martial are much more competent and much more apt to do justice in these cases than Congress can possibly be.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not my experience.

Mr. BOGY. I have no feeling in this case whatever. I am only trying to lay down a principle which should govern Congress in cases of this kind. Here is a competent tribunal, which has tried this young man with all the facts before it beyond a doubt and dismissed him from the Army. Now, we are not in a position to review those facts intelligently.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator this question: Suppose, according to his theory, that we find a case where it is perfectly patent to the world that a great outrage has been perpetrated upon an officer of the Army by the action of a court-martial, will he stand here and say there is no power to review it, because he considers officers of the Army gentlemen?

Mr. BOGY. Pardon me. I have not denied the power. Of course Congress has the power, but Congress ought to use it very sparingly.

Mr. LOGAN. Not only has it the power, but would it not be the duty of Congress to see that no wrong should come to an individual who was serving his country faithfully by the wrong action of a court-martial? Has not Congress time and again reviewed the proceedings of courts-martial and done precisely what we are doing here to-day? Hardly a Congress passes but what the action of some court-martial has been reviewed by Congress.

Mr. BOGY. It is a practice not very commendable, and my object is to arrest that practice as far as I possibly can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay be given him for the actual period he was out of the service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT-COURT TERMS.

Mr. CONKLING. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 53) fixing the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada, to report it back with one amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill just reported favorably from the Judiciary Committee will take but a moment for its consideration. It relates to the terms of the circuit court on the Pacific Coast. The delegation generally are in favor of it, and the bill was prepared on the suggestion of the judge of the circuit court there. It will only take long enough to read it to pass it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to hear the amendment read which was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that a term of the circuit court of the United States for the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada shall be held as follows: For the district of California, on the first Monday of February, second Monday of July, and fourth Monday of November in each year: for the district of Oregon, on the second Monday of April and the first Monday of October in each year; and for the district of Nevada, on the third Monday of March and the first Monday of November in each year.

The second section provides that the act shall take effect on the 1st day of February, 1876; and repeals all provisions of law inconsistent with it.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was to insert at the end of the first section of the bill the following:

And the said terms respectively shall be in the place and stead of those now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Committee on Rules, to whom was recommitted the resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to amend the twenty-fifth rule of the Senate so that bills may be introduced without previous notice, have instructed me to report the same back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. The same committee have also instructed me to report the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed, in entering upon the Journal minutes of the introduction of bills and joint resolutions by unanimous consent without the previous notice required by the twenty-fifth rule, to use in making the entry the following form:

Mr. —— obtained leave to bring in a bill

The order was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, certain papers purporting to be the credentials of Mr. Eustis, of Louisiana, as Senator-elect from that State, were presented the other day, and laid upon the table. I can see no use myself for the reference of those papers to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but on inquiry I am led to believe that that will be the more satisfactory course, and I therefore make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to take from the table the credentials he has named and refer them to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 324) to authorize deposits by clerks and other officers of courts in banks and other designated depositories; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 325) to establish a mint for the coinage of gold and silver at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, and appropriating certain Government grounds and buildings to the use of the same, as also money for the purchase of the necessary machinery; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 326) for the relief of the widow of L. H. Rousseau, deceased, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 327) for the relief of Dr. J. J. Gibson, of Corinth, Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 328) to establish a mail-route in the State of Oregon and Idaho Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 329) to establish certain mail-routes in California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 330) for the relief of Hardie Hogan Helper; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 331) for the relief of James Madison Wells, of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 332) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled, 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States;'" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTER OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court a fixed salary, and having the reports printed by the Government and sold at cost.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit the following resolution; and, if there be no objection, I ask the Senate to consider it at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing section 8, chapter 2, of the Revised Statutes, title 1.

Mr. CONKLING. What is that about?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is that clause in the Revised Statutes which allows the introduction of joint resolutions.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THOMAS H. COATES.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, early in the session I presented the petition of Thomas H. Coates, of North Carolina, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. The committee recently reported the petition back adversely, and it was indefinitely postponed. That report was made by inadvertence. The testimony in the case was not before the committee. I have spoken to the chairman of that committee on the subject, and he concurs in the motion I am about to make. I move to reconsider the vote by which the petition was indefinitely postponed, and that it be re-referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reconsideration of this case? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now I move that the petition be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Ambrose Morrison be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DENNIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of William Cash be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DENNIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Luther R. Smoot be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 124, reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to notify the Senator from Ohio that at one o'clock I expect to call up my resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce the expiration of the morning hour at that time. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Ohio?

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 124) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcholic liquor traffic was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of five persons, neither of whom shall be the holder of any office of profit or trust in the General or a State Government, and all of whom shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or total abstinence in relation to alcoholic or fermented liquors. The said commissioners shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed one year. It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic and manufacture, having special reference to revenue and taxation, distinguishing as far as possible, in the conclusions they arrive at, between the effects produced by the use of distilled or spirituous liquors and the use of fermented or malt liquors, in their economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects, in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States, and the effect produced by such legislation upon the consumption of distilled or spirituous liquors and fermented or malt liquors; also to ascertain whether the evils of drunkenness have been increased or decreased, and whether public morals have been improved thereby. It shall also be the duty of said commissioners to gather information and take testimony as to whether the evil of drunkenness exists to the same extent, or more so, in other civilized countries, and whether those foreign nations that are considered the most temperate in the use of stimulants are so through prohibitory laws; and also to what degree prohibitory legislation has affected the consumption and manufacture of malt and spirituous liquors in this country.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall serve without salary, shall be authorized to employ a secretary at a reasonable compensation, not to exceed $2,000 per annum, which, with the necessary expenses incidental to said investigation, in all not exceeding $10,000, of both the secretary and commissioners, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated upon vouchers to be approved by the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury. It shall be the further duty of said commissioners to report the result of their investigation and the expenses attending the same to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

Mr. BOGY. When was this bill reported?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that this bill was reported by the Committee on Finance a few days since. It is the same in substance, and I think almost in words, as the bill which the Senate passed at the last session of Congress. It is reported at the earnest request of a great number of petitioners who have petitioned both the last and present Congress, asking that a fair and impartial investigation be made, not by men on one side only, but by men on both sides, to examine into the acknowledged evils that spring from the sale of intoxicating drinks, and see whether, in our legislation for this District and for the Territories, or in the assessment of our revenue, there can be any reforms made that will tend to promote temperance and good order.

Mr. HOWE. How much time is allowed?

Mr. SHERMAN. A year. The commissioners are to serve without pay, and are not to be officers of the General or the State Governments. They are not to be men of one opinion, but of all opinions. The bill was amended at the last session somewhat, and the Committee on Finance reported, as amended, the bill as it passed at the last session. I do not care myself to discuss the question, but hope the measure will pass.

Mr. BOGY. I shall not discuss the bill on its merits at this time, but will only say that I am opposed to its passage. Not that I am an advocate of intemperance, for I am a temperance man myself to a certain extent, and have never favored intemperance, but always discountenanced it. Nevertheless my opposition to this bill is one of principle. I am opposed to that class of legislation. I am opposed to that class of subjects being brought before the Congress of the United States for its action. I think all subjects of that character had better be left to the legislation of the States, and relieve Congress from the vast mass of legislation which will follow this system. Our tables are now groaning under a large number of bills, and the number is increasing with great rapidity every day, and we are gradually drawing from the States all matters of legislation, and assuming to pass upon those subjects ourselves here.

But this subject of temperance partakes of the moral order; it touches the relations of man in society. It has nothing of a Federal character in it. It is of that class of subjects which we call the moral or social order, and with which the Congress of the United States has, according to the principles of the Constitution, nothing to do. If we gradually absorb all this vast mass of legislation the year will not be long enough for us to investigate these endless subjects. It is doing the States not only great injustice, but doing the Congress great injustice.

It is true the way the subject is presented it is covered up with the statement that the investigation is to be one affecting the revenue; but that is merely a cover. The commissioners are authorized to investigate the subject in its moral aspects; are authorized to investigate the effect of the trade in alcohol, not only in this country but in Europe, and whether the legislation that has taken place in the different states of Europe has tended to diminish or increase the evils of drunkenness. It provides a wide subject of legislation with which I contend we have nothing to do.

It is said that we had the same bill before our body last winter, and that it passed the Senate. I then had the same objection to it that I have now. The subject is one with which we ought not to interfere; it belongs exclusively to the State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] relative to the Mississippi election.

Mr. MORTON. My health is such that I am not able to go on this morning; but the Senator from West Virginia spoke to me last week and expressed his desire to proceed this morning with the consideration of a resolution of his which is pending, and I told him that so far as I was concerned I would not stand in the way.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator from West Virginia proceeds, I give notice that as soon as this matter is over I will try to get the action of the Senate on the bill which is now the unfinished business of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Indiana to move to postpone the pending order and all prior orders, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF SENATOR O. S. FERRY.

Mr. EATON. With the consent of the Senator from West Virginia, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday of next week, being February 2, I will offer resolutions in regard to the death of my late colleague, Mr. FERRY. The subject is postponed to that late day on the request of a Senator who desires to be heard on the resolutions, and who is now absent. I shall ask the consideration of the Senate to the matter on that day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 219) to permit the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania to retire;

A bill (H. R. No. 828) to correct an error in enrollment;

A bill (H. R. No. 1208) to correct a mistake in and amend section 4130 of the Revised Statutes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1343) to relieve S. J. Gholson, of Mississippi, of his political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 12th instant.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I hope to be as brief as the subject will permit, and I expect to show that the statements made in my former remarks in support of this resolution are fully sustained by the facts and figures, while the explanations of the changes of figures and discrepancies made by several Senators, and especially the Senator from Massachusetts, the Ex-Secretary of the Treasury, are not well founded and are not fully sustained by the reports.

I will also cite a few other instances and examples from the finance reports of changes and discrepancies in the annual statements of receipts and the public debt. I have been told by Senators in debate that my statements and remarks might affect the public credit. In this connection I desire to say that it is far from me by word or deed to injure the public credit. It belongs to us all, and to sustain and uphold it should be the pride and duty of all. What I have said or done I have intended to be in the interest of the public credit and the welfare of the people of this country, and I desire to ask who is the true friend of the public credit and of the country? Is it he who attempts to cover up and keep in the dark errors, irregularities, and frauds (if there are any) in the administration of the Government, or he who exposes and brings them to light?

If there have been gross errors and mismanagement, changes of figures and statements without warrant of law in the Treasury of the nation, let it be known, to the end that they may be corrected and such laws passed and regulations adopted as will prevent a recurrence of the same.

To me this is a most serious question, and of vital interest to the whole country away above and beyond all party considerations, and I have endeavored fairly, calmly, and impartially to treat it as such. If the records, figures, and statements of the Treasury Department that have been fixed and reported for years can be changed and altered at will, then our financial affairs can never rest on a sound basis, and our public credit, so long as this state of affairs exists, will be constantly imperiled.

I will now review the speech of the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] in reply to my former remarks. He informs us that he was aided by a statement prepared at the Treasury Department. I ask the Clerk to read the remarks of the Senator [Mr. BOUTWELL] which I have marked in the paper I send to the desk.

The first definite statement made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia related to the annual expenditures from 1861 to 1866, including two statements, one drawn from the reports previous to 1870 and the other drawn from the report of 1870, showing a difference or increase in the latter report of the sum of $3,271,970.43, This difference is made up from many items. The entire amount of the difference shows an increase in the expenditures during the years mentioned of the sum of $3,271,970.43; and a summary explanation may be stated thus: In the finance report of 1869, page 321, are included outstanding warrants to the amount of $4,018,091.91 which do not appear in the report for 1870. In the report for 1870, page 275, are included trust funds to the amount of $7,290,062.54 which do not appear in the report for 1869. The difference between the two, the sum of $3,271,970.43, is the exact difference claimed to be an increase of expenditures as shown by the statement.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator says the difference "is made up from many items," yet explains only two. Warrants and trust funds. What warrants? We are not told by the Senator, what or how or where they came from. He simply says warrants and trust funds. He has not even told us what trust funds? If we examine the reports of 1869, page 321, also the report of 1870, page 275—which are the pages we are directed by the Secretary to examine—you find no reference to warrants or trust funds. Again, the reports of 1869 and 1870, from which I took the figures used, was years after the report was closed and sent to Congress. The amounts given by the Senator is not as he states "the exact difference." They do not agree. The next point of the honorable Senator [Mr. BOUTWELL] is as follows, which the Clerk will read.

The next specific statement by the honorable Senator from West Virginia is this. He says:

"The net ordinary expenditures of the Government for the year 1865, as stated in the finance report for 1869, are $1,212,911,270.41. The same expenditures for the same year, as stated in the finance report for 1870, are $1,214,349,195.43, showing an increase of $1,437,925,02."

In the preparation of these two statements different data are included under the head of "net ordinary expenditures." For instance, in the finance report of 1869 there was included an item for the purchase of gold coin authorized by the first section of the act of March 17, 1862, amounting to $5,072,900.11. Under the same head there was also a payment of $735,416.93 of outstanding warrants which belonged to previous years, these two items amounting to $5,808,304.04. In the report for 1870 the items of trust funds, namely, Chickasaw and Choctaw and Navy pension fund, amounting to $7,242,242, are included under the head of "net ordinary expenses," precisely as I before stated in reference to a similar matter under the head of expenditures. The difference between these two accounts represents the discrepancy referred to, $1,433,937.96.

Mr. DAVIS. Here again you have warrants and trust funds coming in. Whether or not they are the same warrants and trust funds used in the last explanation the Senator does not tell us.

Again, this year's (1865) accounts had been closed and reported to Congress five times in five annual reports, and then it is changed and increased near a million and a half of dollars.

If the figures given were the true cause of the increase they ought to agree, but they will not by thousands of dollars.

It is plain, Mr. President, that the figures given do not balance by several thousand dollars. Now I will ask the Clerk to be kind enough to read the next point of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] which is in regard to pensions.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The next item relates to pension expenditures. In the report of 1872, as stated by the honorable Senator from West Virginia—and his statement, I believe, is correct—the expenditures for pensions are stated for the year 1864–'65 at $16,347,621.34. In the report of 1869 the same expenditures for the same year are stated at $9,291,610.48. The latter, a small sum, represents the amount of pensions actually paid to persons authorized to receive pensions under the laws of the United States. There had accumulated in the Treasury Department an amount of money, $7,000,000 and more, arising from naval operations or forfeitures under the laws, which had been placed on the books of the Department to the credit of the pension appropriations, whether wisely or not I cannot say.

Mr. DAVIS. In this case warrants would not do; the amount was too large. So the naval pension fund is brought in and seven millions taken from that to make up this large increase. Now, this naval pension fund was set aside by law, and no one had a right to use it. This the Ex-Secretary knew, and in his remarks he admitted this. Bear in mind this large increase occurred five years after the report was made to Congress and after the accounts for 1865 were closed. Now, after $7,000,000 are taken from the pension fund unlawfully, there is still unaccounted for $56,010.86, to which no reference whatever is made.

The next item that the Senator refers to in his reply to me is the item showing a discrepancy of $5,840.73. The Senator says:

That is explained by the circumstance to which I have referred, that warrants drawn had not been paid in full, and when the analysis was made there was a difference of that amount.

"In the report of 1870"—

Says the honorable Senator from West Virginia—

"the expenditures for pensions in the year 1870 are stated at $28,340,202.17.

In the report of 1874"—

"The last report preceding that which we now have—

"the same expenditures for the same year (1870) are stated at $28,402,241.20, showing an increase in the report of 1874 over 1870 of $52,039.03."

This is explained in the same way: warrants drawn in prior years and paid that year.

The next item is naval expenditures, showing an increase in the report of 1871 over the report of 1869, in naval expenditures for the year 1865, of $49,657.95, the amount of outstanding warrants paid, including the naval hospital fund.

There are three or four separate and distinct items in different years which increase largely the amounts reported to Congress as expenditures. Warrants and hospital funds are used here to cover up and explain this increase. Now this is a convenient way to explain increases and changes in statements to Congress. If the amounts had been ten times as much and ten times as great, warrants paid and unpaid might have been used. What convenient things these warrants are!

The next item that the Senator refers to is the accounts of the War Department, where there was a discrepancy of $4,015,800.99.

The Senator says:

Now, it happens that at the close of that year there were outstanding warrants, that is, warrants on which the full amount had not been paid, amounting to $5,306,612.24, and at the end of the year there were still outstanding warrants which had been drawn previous to the commencement of that year amounting to $1,290,801.25, showing $4,015,810.99, being within $10 of the precise amount, according to the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia. That $10 thus far has not been explained.

Again, the warrants paid and unpaid come in and are made to explain over four millions in a single year in one Department. But still the warrants would not quite balance, and the Senator says $10 is yet to be explained. Why stop to talk about $10 when there are many millions not accounted for, which the Senator passes without explanation; $10, let it go. Pensions or warrants will explain it.

Mr. President, I come next to a statement as to the Indian expenditures, which I will thank the Clerk to read, and I call the attention of the Senate especially to this because I was corrected by the Senator from Massachusetts, and two or three other Senators joined with him, and I want to show him and the Senate that I was then correct, and that the matter stands to-day as it then stood.

The expenditures of the Indian Department for the year 1870 are stated by the Senator from West Virginia as follows:

In the report for the year 1870 the expenses in the Indian Department for the year 1863 are reported in the statement of annual expenditures at	$3,152,032 70
While in the report for the year 1868 these same expenses are reported for the same year at	1,076,326 35
Showing an increase in the figures of the report of 1870 over the report of 1868 in the Indian expenditures for the same year of	2,075,706 35

Somebody has to plead guilty to an error there. If the honorable Senator from West Virginia will look at the statement he will observe that the Indian expenses and the pension expenses are in parallel columns, one following the other. It happened that one year, 1868, the compositor set up the figures which should have been placed under the head of "Indian expenses" under the head of pensions." They were exactly reversed. The next year each was put in its proper place, and the country is indebted to the honorable Senator from West Virginia for compelling us to make this discovery.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, here is a positive and plain statement that the above was an error of the printer, and existed but one year, and that after that all was made right; and I have the credit, according to the Senator from Massachusetts, of compelling us to make this discovery.

I ask the attention of Senators to what followed; and it will be seen that the Senator from Massachusetts was in error, and not the printer nor the Senator from West Virginia.

Here is what was said; and you see several Senators joined to help the Ex-Secretary [Mr. BOUTWELL] to clinch the nail:

Mr. DAVIS. Of course I have not the figures before me, but my impression is that the Senator will find a different state of things. I think there is a discrepancy in several reports.

Mr. SHERMAN. The first statement is correct?

Mr. BOUTWELL. They were transposed one year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Which is the correct one?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not prepared at this moment to say which is the correct one, but they were transposed, so that what the Senator from West Virginia says, that there appeared to be that change, actually did appear. That is, the pension expenses one year were put under the head of the Indian expenses and the Indian expenses at the same time were put under the head of pension expenses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was done by the printer.

Mr. BOUTWELL. By the printer. It was not discovered in time, but the change was made back again the next year with an alteration of about $8,000 finally, in consequence of warrants drawn and not paid; so that one of those accounts was changed.

Mr. CONKLING. The transposition was not on the books of the Department?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It did not touch the books of the Depa tment. It was merely a mistake in the printing office, which was not observed by the proof-reader.

Now, let us see what the facts are. The Indian expenses were stated in the report of 1863 at $1,076,326.35, and at the same amount in the reports of 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869; and in 1870 the amount was changed and increased to $3,152,032.70, sustaining my figures and position—showing an increase of $2,075,076.35.

Now we will examine the reports since 1870 and see if the statement of the honorable Senator [Mr. BOUTWELL] is sustained, namely, that it was a transposition of figures, which occurred but one year and was the fault of the printer.

Mr. President, up to to-day the figures stood just as I stated them. There is no transposition of them. They are in the reports to-day as I stated them, and they have been in the reports from that day to this. You will find in the statement just made to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury that under the head "Indians" for 1863 the figures I then gave still stand, and there could not have been a transposition or change simply of figures; but the fact remains that the Indian expenses between 1863 and 1870 were raised over $2,000,000, and the figures are standing to-day, and prove what I asserted. But several Senators who took part in the discussion at that time thought differently; nevertheless, it is yet so, and has remained so all the time.

We find that the Indian expenditure continues at $3,152,032.70, and no change or transposition, as stated by the honorable Senator, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] We also find the figures as to pensions differ, and are not the same previous and subsequent to 1870. Therefore a mere transposition, as claimed, will not answer the purpose, and in fact it is not the case. The figures to-day stand as I stated, and the annual statements show the $2,000,000 increase in Indian expenditures for 1863.

I will thank the Clerk to read what I have marked from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia says:

"I come next to the discrepancies in the statements of revenue collected.

"In the finance report for 1863, in the annual statement of revenue collected for that year, we find the internal revenue stated at $7,640,787.95."

Then he goes on to say—it is not a very definite statement, as I understand it—that afterward this sum one year, or a sum equal to this, disappeared from the receipts and afterward re-appeared. The simple truth about it is this, that a clerk in the Treasury Department, the public-debt account standing upon the sheet from which he prepared his statement for the printer immediately below the receipts of internal revenue for that year, added the receipts from internal revenue into the public debt. It was a gross mistake, inexcusable; but that is the fact. It was afterward explained in the reports, but I suppose it escaped the observation of the honorable Senator from West Virginia. The error was corrected in a subsequent report.

This thirty-seven millions the honorable Senator says was dropped from revenue and added to the debt statement by a clerk, and yet the books balanced! How is it possible that $37,000,000 could drop in and out and cause no confusion in the books or alarm in the Treasury Department? This is a sad commentary upon the book-keeping of this great nation!

The Senator from Massachusetts said further:

In the report for 1871, which is one of the years to which the attention of the Senate has been called, the statement of the public debt represents the principal of the debt as made from receipts and expenditures. That for the year 1870 is made up from entirely different data, principally from the loan accounts. Other items are included, however, as will be made apparent from the following analysis:

The statement in the report of 1870 of the amount for the year appears as given, $2,386,358,591.74. The data from which this was made up are as follows:

Principal of the debt	$2,601,675,127 83
To which is added interest accrued	50,607,556 52
Making total debt, principal and interest	2,652,282,684 35
From this amount were deducted—
Coin in the Treasury	112,776,048 88
Currency in the Treasury	28,945,067 19
Sinking fund in United States coin-interest bonds with accrued interest thereon, and other coin-interest bonds purchased with accrued interest thereon	124,202,968 54
Leaving the amount of the debt as above stated, less cash in the Treasury and bonds with interest thereon	2,386,358,599 74

The amount of the debt in the report of 1871, which of course was larger for the fiscal year 1870, is stated at $2,480,672,427.81, and represents the exact principal of the debt after deducting the principal of the bonds purchased on sinking-fund account, and excluding the item of accrued interest as above stated, and also the entire amount of cash in the Treasury.

The statement for the fiscal year 1869 was prepared in precisely the same manner and with the same results. The chief difficulty in regard to these accounts arose from the circumstances that the Register used the statement of the public debt made by the Secretary of the Treasury, which included accrued interest on the one hand, and from the aggregate so obtained the cash in the Treasury was deducted. This was an erroneous proceeding on his part.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] explained the debt for the same year—1870—and did so with different items and figures. This shows that the Ex-Secretary [Mr. BOUTWELL] and the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SHERMAN] do not understand alike the annual statements of the public debt. Now, if those two Senators do not understand the statements of the Treasury Department, who can? It will be noticed that the Senators have taken but one year of the nine I cited, and both the same year—1870—for the purposes of explanation, leaving eight years, in which the public debt was increased or decreased, entirely unnoticed.

I now come to the discrepancies and changes of figures cited in my former remarks which have not been explained or attempted to be by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senators. I have the statement of expenditures as given by myself showing that $3,271,970 was the total; but by looking over the report it will be found that I gave separate and distinct years, one of which was $9,000,000, another $4,000,000, another one and a half millions of dollars; yet the Senator passed over this entirely without any notice whatever. Nine millions in a single year the expenditures were advanced, and no notice was taken of it whatever in the reply!

I come now to the loans, Treasury notes, &c., cited by myself. I stated that the report of 1863 and subsequent reports put the loans and Treasury notes for the year 1863 at different amounts:

In the report of 1863	$756,489,905 57
In the report of 1864	776,682,361 57
In the report of 1870	814,925,494 96

These different figures are all for the same year. Now think of it, loans and Treasury notes that ought to agree, changing with the different years, and if you take the report of 1875 you will find that the figures are again changed to another amount. In the debt statements of which I drew comparisons I showed that there was a difference of $248,960,352.94, and gave nine years as examples. Those, too, are passed over with very slight explanation. I said then, and I say now, that for the nine years it will be seen that the report of 1871 increased the public debt for the years named in the aggregate, $248,960,352.94; and that in the single year of 1870 the report of 1871 increases the public debt over the report of 1870 for that year over $94,000,000 and for the year 1869 over $99,000,000; and for the year 1864 the increase is more than $75,000,000 and for the year 1863 more than $21,000,000; in the year 1862 about $10,000,000; and yet but one of the years is noticed by either of the Senators who made replies to myself.

Now, it is a fact that in 1871 there was a wholesale change in figures running back thirty or forty years in the table of the Register, and altering the amounts, which, in some instances, had been fixed, closed, and reported to Congress for twenty or thirty years. This change and alteration of figures increased the public debt in the aggregate $247,766,674.71.

Now, Senators, think of it, that official annual statements of the public debt, after having been reported to Congress each year for from one to thirty years, are changed and increased hundreds of millions of dollars and no report is made to Congress of the fact, nor is there any law to justify it. There must have been an object. What it was let those who made the changes answer.

There is no question about the change of annual official statements; but the Senator from Massachusetts says the books have not been changed. If they have not, the statements to Congress and the books do not agree; one or the other or both may be wrong. Certainly both cannot be right. Which are we to accept as correct, or ought each to be rejected?

It is said that the Register changed the figures. I cannot believe he would do so without authority from some official whose order he felt bound to obey. I venture the prediction that if to-day you ask the Register whether or not the warrants, &c., in his office will sustain the reports to Congress or his books, he will tell you they cannot sustain both. I again ask, why were the annual reports and statements to Congress changed? What was the object? Was it to force balances? Was it that the bonds sold, revenue received, cash on hand, and expenditures would not agree?

I have several times asked how and from what was the Secretary's new table of 1870 made up, and no reply has been made. This table is the starting-point of great changes. We are told that in the nature of things the reports from year to year cannot agree. If this be so, how is it that from the beginning of the Government to 1870 they did substantially agree and for the last few years they agree? It is strange, yes more than strange, that at about 1870 the great changes took place which decrease revenue years after it was covered into the Treasury, also increased the public debt and expenditure many, many millions. The large alterations and changes involving hundreds of millions took place between the years 1860 and 1871.

I have not compared the Treasurer's and Register's accounts. There I would expect a difference, owing to paid and unpaid warrants, &c., but I cannot see why the Secretary's and Register's accounts differ so widely. I now desire to cite other and further instances and examples not referred to in my former remarks wherein the statements of the revenue collected have been changed so as to decrease the amounts, and the statements of the expenditures and public debt changed so as to increase the amounts thereof for the same year, and I omit for the present to refer to the changes, discrepancies, and irregularities that I think exist in the loan division of the Treasury Department, especially as to bonds issued and redeemed, commissions and interest paid, the cash and coin account for different years, and the Bureau of Printing and Engraving; nor to the confessed difference of $116,000,000 in the statement of the public debt, which is attempted to be explained away on page 20 of the finance report of 1871, believing the committee, if appointed, will bring these and many others to light, or they will be treated by some other Senator abler than myself if the committee should not do it.

If we compare the statements of the annual revenue collected made by the Register in the finance report for 1866 for the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865 with the statements of the annual revenue collected in the finance reports for 1870 for the same years, we not only find that the amounts differ widely but the finance report for 1870 states that the revenue collected for these years was much less. For instance:

For year 1862.

Report for 1866 states net revenue collected	$51,935,720 76
Report for 1870 states net revenue collected	51,907,944 62
Showing a decrease of	27,776,14

For year 1863.

Report for 1866 states net revenue collected	112,687,290 95
Report for 1870 states net revenue collected	74,448,157 55
Showing a decrease of	38,239,133 40

For year 1864.

Report for 1866 states net revenue collected	$264,626,771 60
Report for 1870 states net revenue collected	262,742,354 32
Showing a decrease of	1,884,417 28

For year 1865.

Report for 1866 states net revenue collected	333,714,605 08
Report for 1870 states net revenue collected	323,092,785 92
Showing a decrease of	10,621,819 16

What explanation there can be for these enormous differences I cannot imagine, and I do not believe any whatever can be made. Here we find that the amounts of the net revenue collected during certain years have been determined and fixed for these years at certain and definite sums and reported to Congress in the annual reports for eight years without any difference or disagreement between the reports until 1870, when it occurs that these sums so determined, fixed, and reported are changed and altered to smaller amounts, showing that the net revenue was not what it had been reported by former officers for these years, but was in the aggregate $50,000,000 less.

Now what became of this fifty millions; how did it disappear? If the reports from 1862 to 1869 are to be believed and credited it was in the Treasury of the United States; but the Secretary in 1870 says in effect it was not there.

It is useless to say that when money is once covered into the Treasury it can be paid out or disappear except by virtue of an appropriation by Congress.

Warrants issued and warrants paid, trust funds, pension funds, coin in the Treasury, and other items have been made use of to explain discrepancies in the statement of the annual expenditures; but they can be of no aid to show why, when revenue has once been covered into the Treasury and reported to Congress for a certain year, it can be decreased.

PUBLIC DEBT STATEMENTS.

I will now refer to some changes in the statement of the public debt. In all of the finance reports from 1835 to 1870 the public debt has been stated for the following years as follows:

July 1, 1836	$291,089 05
1841	6,737,398 00
1858	44,910,777 66
1860	64,769,703 08

The finance report for 1871 on page 369 in the statement of the public debt changes these figures, in every instance increasing them, and states the public debt for these same years at—

1837	3,308,124 07
1841	13,594,480 73
1843	32,742,922 00
1858	44,911,881 03
1859	58,496,837 88
1860	64,842,287 88

The aggregate increase in the public debt in these years is over $13,000,000.

The report of 1871 changes the figures and increases the public debt over all former reports for the year 1837 nearly $1,500,000; for the year 1841, over $6,000,000; and for the year 1843, over $5,000,000.

It must be borne in mind that these changes which were made in the year 1871 reach back from that year to the year 1836, a period of thirty-five years.

Now, how is it possible there can be an explanation of these discrepancies or any warrant for them?

While on this subject of the public debt and the changes in the statements thereof, I desire to state further that I find what is generally known as the Pacific Railroad debt was, by Mr. McCulloch for several years and his successor in the year 1869, stated and reported as a part of the public debt, amounting in that year to near $60,000,000; but in the report of 1870 this item of near $60,000,000 is stricken from the public debt and placed in a separate table, and from that year until now it has been and is reported and treated not as a part of the public debt but as a debt of the Pacific railroad, when in fact it was and is as much a public debt as it was when stated and reported as such in the reports of 1869 and previous years.

In the year 1870 there was an apparent reduction of the public debt of over $100,000,000, (according to the finance report;) but this reduction was in a large measure only apparent, and due to a stroke of the pen—a mere transfer of about $30,000,000 to another table. The country gave credit to the administration for this large decrease of the public debt during this year, when in fact the larger part of it was due to the change in book-keeping and the Secretary's new tables.

In the course of the debate on the resolution now under consideration the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SHERMAN] made use of this language, which I will thank the Clerk to read.

> The accounts of the Treasury Department have always been based upon the system established by Alexander Hamilton, enlarged from time to time by the growth of the operations of the Government. Instead of one Auditor in the Treasury, there are now six; instead of one Comptroller, there are now three; instead of thirty or forty clerks in the different branches of the Treasury, there are now somewhere from two to three thousand—the amount of business is so enormously enlarged. I have often heard it complained that the system of keeping accounts in some branches of the service ought to be changed, but it is a very difficult and very dangerous process, and I invite the careful scrutiny of any man who undertakes to improve on the work of Alexander Hamilton and Albert Gallatin and all the great men who have filled the office of Secretary of the Treasury, and to devise a better system of accounting than they with their mature minds and long experience established, and which has been enlarged with the gradual growth of our Government. Their system has been the frame-work of our finances for more than eighty years. The gradual additions to the mode of accounting that have been made by law have probably made as perfect a system as can be devised. But he must be a bold man and a wise man who will undertake, without study and experience, to step in and devise a better system than this. If we had such a man, if there is such a one who is willing to undertake the task, I shall be very glad to co-operate with him. I doubt very much the propriety of any tinkering with so complicated a machine as the Treasury Department.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I know that figures and facts are always very dry subjects, and I am sorry to see that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has left the Chamber for a moment. I have something to which I want to call his attention.

I fully agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in all that he has stated as to the complete system of keeping the accounts in the Treasury Department, adopted and perfected by such great men as Alexander Hamilton, Albert Gallatin, and others; and I particularly agree with him when he says:

> He must be a bold man and a wise man who will undertake, without study and experience, to step in and devise a better system than this.

But, sir, this bold and wise man seems to have been found in 1870 and 1871, because in those years great changes and alterations are found to have taken place in the statements and annual reports of the Treasury Department. And I agree with the Senator entirely when he says:

> I doubt very much the propriety of any tinkering with so complicated a machine as the Treasury Department.

And because of this interference, changing and alteration of statements, especially in the years 1870 and 1871, I have introduced this resolution so that the facts may be made known. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] admits that he introduced a new system, and uses this language:

> In 1869 and 1870, when we found that there were no present means of checking the accounts of the Register of the Treasury, we instituted a public-debt account in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and we went back. * * * And therefore this system of which so much complaint is made now was instituted in 1869 and 1870 as a check upon the Register's Office and for the purpose of enabling the Senator from West Virginia to ascertain whether the accounts of the Treasury were accurate or not—giving as a reason that this "system was instituted in 1869 and 1870 as a check upon the Register's Office."

My understanding and belief are that the First Comptroller and the Treasurer have always been a check upon the Register, and the Senator may have been in error in his statement and reason for instituting his new system and tables; certainly he was as to the revenue and expenditures.

Now, in the face of these facts, enough to produce alarm, I do not hesitate to re-affirm and declare that changes and alterations of figures in the finance reports have been made involving large amounts. It is certain that in the report for 1870-'71 the revenue collected for certain years has been decreased and that the expenditures and public debt have been increased. There must have been some object more than has been made known, and I leave it to them who know best to explain what it was.

Since the introduction of the resolution under consideration I have been asked if I charged or intended to charge fraud or the improper use of money in the Treasury Department during certain years. I have not stated that there was fraud, nor have I said there was not. When I first presented to the Senate figures and facts which clearly showed many changes and alterations in the annual statements made to Congress involving large amounts, I was disposed to believe and did hope they could and would be explained by some Senator or Treasury official.

The facts are, however, that several Senators, and especially the senior Senator from Massachusetts, aided by a statement from the Treasury Department, have endeavored to explain a portion of these changes and discrepancies, and in my judgment have thrown but little, if any, light upon them; and as to the other portion no attempt whatever has been made to explain them. And when I consider that every opportunity has been afforded those who ought to understand the workings of the Treasury Department, and even the Treasury officials themselves, to render an explanation, and they fail, I am reluctantly compelled to the conclusion that there is no reasonable explanation to be had, and that these changes and alterations have not resulted in public good, and if there have been frauds they have in part served to cover up and conceal them.

In my investigations I have been compelled to rely on the official reports only for information. I have had no aid in discovering these alterations and changes from the Treasury Department or its officials. Whenever I have made inquiry of any person connected with the Treasury Department as to changes and discrepancies pointed out by myself, I have been treated with politeness and met with a disposition to explain them away.

The resolution now under consideration was introduced with no purpose except to obtain what I regard as important public information, and in the presentation of the facts I have gleaned in its support I have undertaken to be fair toward the subject and toward all who may have been in the least generally or especially affected by it. I believe the matters I have presented demand thorough investigation and prompt correction. I am sorry there are leading Senators on the other side who do not agree with me. At first it seemed that all were for investigation by a special committee; but now it is proposed to send it to a committee a large majority of which is friendly to the Administration responsible for the changes and discrepancies I have pointed out, and some of whom have avowed opinions as to the correctness of such alterations. Would not this be sending the child to an unfriendly nurse?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] to strike out the words "a committee of five be appointed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Committee on Finance be instructed."

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when the name of Mr. BURNSIDE was called.) I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. BURNSIDE] is detained at home by sickness in his family and that he is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] who is absent also. If my colleague were here he would vote "yea," and the Senator from North Carolina, if here, would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. COOPER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (when the name of Mr. EDMUNDS was called.) My colleague is now absent. If he were here he would undoubtedly vote for his own amendment. He is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.]

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll; and the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Robertson, West, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Withers—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conover, Cooper, Edmunds, Hamilton, Johnston, Kernan, Merrimon, Oglesby, Patterson, Ransom, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, and Windom—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the resolution as amended.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the resolution, as amended, be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to investigate the books and accounts of the Treasury Department, particularly with reference to discrepancies and alterations in amounts and figures that have been made in them, especially in the annual statements of the expenditures of the Government, revenue collected, and the public debt contained in said reports; and if any such discrepancies and alterations be found to exist, to report the same and the extent and nature thereof, the years wherein they occur, by what authority made if any, the reasons that induced them, and to report generally such other and further information bearing upon the subject as to them may seem best; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the vote include the preamble also?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let the preamble be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there appear to be material alterations and discrepancies in the official finance reports of the Treasury Department as to the annual expenditures, receipts of the Government, and public debt, and particularly in the reports of 1869 to 1872, inclusive, which discrepancies and changes and alterations involve large amounts, and no satisfactory explanation appears on the face for the same: Therefore

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose it is not necessary to move to strike the preamble out, although I shall be opposed to its adoption because it assumes as facts the matters which we have instructed the committee to ascertain. I therefore ask for a separate vote upon it, and if it were in order I would move to strike it out.

Mr. DAVIS and others. The entire resolution has been agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But not the preamble. I move to lay the preamble on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposes that the preamble is usually the last thing to be acted upon; but he is not familiar with the custom of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. The resolution having passed, laying the preamble on the table does not affect the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not.

Mr. DAVIS. Am I mistaken when I suppose that we have acted upon the entire resolution as presented by myself and amended by the Senator from Vermont and that it has passed?

Mr. CONKLING. Not the preamble. The other day, the Senator will remember, a division was called upon the resolution and preamble. The Chair put, as he was compelled to put, the resolution first.

Mr. DAVIS. My recollection is not the same as that of the Senator from New York. I have no recollection of a division of the question being called for. If the Senator is positive——

Mr. CONKLING. I am quite sure the RECORD will show it.

Mr. DAVIS. My understanding is, and I believe it has always been the usage of the Senate, that the vote is taken upon a paper as presented, unless a division is called for and ordered by the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I will call the attention of my friend from West Virginia to the fact that when the resolution was read just now, for the vote, it was reported without the preamble.

Mr. CONKLING. As it ought to be under the rule of the Senate governing the case. What is the question before the Senate? The Senator from Vermont has moved to lay the preamble on the table. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly not.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I ask a vote of the Senate upon that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was hearing the conversation of Senators around him for his own information, and did not put the question at once.

Mr. CONKLING. I waited till the Senator from West Virginia had concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on laying the preamble on the table, which is not debatable unless by common consent.

Mr. CONKLING and others. Question.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator from New York wish to prevent any explanation?

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all. The motion, as I understand it, is not debatable. I merely asked for a vote, supposing the Senator had concluded. I do not object to any explanation he wishes to make. I wish to make none.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to be informed whether there was any motion to divide this question. If there was, that is a matter of fact which can be readily determined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not able to state. The Chair does not remember, but the Senator from New York states that he is sure.

Mr. CONKLING. I am quite confident of this, and I think other Senators will be equally so. Several days ago, when this question came up, it was remarked by at least one Senator, and I think more than one, that there was no objection to the resolution, except as to the question of what committee the inquiry should be intrusted to; the preamble, however, was another matter. And now it occurs to me that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] not in his seat, although I think in the Chamber, among others, said that there were allegations of fact in the preamble which he did not believe, and of course, would not vote for; but that to the resolution he had no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. My recollection is also the same, and I think my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] made the same remark.

Mr. CONKLING. And I am quite confident the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] as his colleague suggests, said the same thing. But I venture to suggest, although the remark would come, perhaps, more properly from the Chair, to the Senator from Kentucky, that without any demand for a division, the question is not taken en masse on a preamble and resolution. On the contrary, it is taken first on the resolution, and the preamble is voted upon afterward separately. It is just as the title of a bill is something independent of the bill itself. Therefore I should insist, as I have no doubt the Chair would rule, that even though no exception had been taken to the preamble, the resolution having been read, and that only, and the vote taken upon it, the preamble must be separately adopted, if it is adopted at all. If that be the rule, as I am quite sure it is, the question whether anybody objected to the preamble would be quite unimportant. The motion now is to lay the preamble, which has not been voted on, upon the table, and certainly I do not think the Senate can avoid that vote.

Mr. STEVENSON. My object was to ascertain whether the impression of the Senator from New York was right as to whether there had been a call for a division of this question. If there has been no call for a division of the question, then the Chair will be called upon to rule whether a resolution carries with it the preamble. This whole debate draws no distinction, so far as I have been able to see, between the preamble and resolution. Then the Chair would be called upon to decide whether, having put the question upon the resolution, not distinguishing between the preamble and resolution, after it had been passed, it was to be divided without a motion to reconsider. If there had been a motion to separate this question, as the Senator from New York thinks there was, and upon which I have no impression, then it would be clear that we should have to vote upon the preamble; but, if there has not been, I am not by any means prepared to say upon the question of order that the whole has not been passed by the vote which has just taken place in the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It must be within the recollection of all Senators here that it was distinctly avowed by more than one Senator that there was no objection to the resolution if it should be amended so as not to raise a special committee and if the preamble should be stricken out. I presume no parliamentarian here will contend that the adoption of the resolution adopts the preamble also. It has always been, so far as my recollection goes, both here and in the other House, that the preamble was open to amendment or rejection after the passage of any resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. My recollection is that some Senator, and perhaps two, said that there would be no objection to the resolution, but that there might be objection to the preamble, as the Senator from Vermont has said; but my recollection is also fully distinct that no motion of that kind was made. The whole question now appears to be whether or not the preamble goes with the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia a question? Does he suppose that where a division is in order a motion is necessary to obtain that division? The mere insistment, I suggest, of any single member is all that is required. But, if I may interrupt the Senator, I beg to inquire of the Chair as a matter of usage, regardless now of the question whether any demand was made for a division or not, whether the vote just taken upon the resolution does, or does not, dispose of the preamble.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the vote taken upon the resolution has nothing whatever to do with the preamble. That is left open for further action as a matter of parliamentary law.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, of course, it becomes entirely immaterial whether this demand was made, or not.

Mr. DAVIS. That being the case, the Senator from New York is right. My impression, however, was that when we acted upon the resolution we acted upon the whole. No Senators have referred to it to-day; they may have previously referred to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that the preamble lie upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. COOPER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] He would vote "yea" and I "nay" on the present motion.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, West, Windom, and Wright—35

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Withers—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conover, Cooper, Edmunds, Kernan, Merrimon, Oglesby, Ransom, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Whyte—15.

So the preamble was laid on the table.

VICE-CONSULS GENERAL.

Mr. CONKLING. There lies on the table a bill received to-day from the House of Representatives which I ask to have read—it is very brief—for information. Then if it be the pleasure of the Senate I will ask to have it put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks the reading of a bill. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be reported.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No.1208) to correct a mistake in and amend section 4130 of the Revised Statutes was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It enacts that section 4130 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by inserting after the words "consul general" the words "vice-consul general;" so that the section shall read as follows:

SEC. 4130. The word "minister," when used in this title, shall be understood to mean the person invested with and exercising the principal diplomatic functions. The word "consul" shall be understood to mean any person invested by the United States with and exercising the functions of consul-general, vice-consul general, consul, or vice-consul.

Mr. CONKLING. This bill is identical in terms with one already reported unanimously by the Committee on Commerce of this body. I have here a letter from the State Department explaining the necessity for the alteration; I will have it read if any Senator wishes. In substance, it is, that as the section of the Revised Statutes now stands, during the absence or disability of a consul-general the duties committed to him by that section cease. The purpose is to allow the vice-consul general, in the absence of the consul-general, to discharge those duties. The reason for it, I think, is very clear, and is evidenced at large in these papers from the Department; but the subject having been considered by committees of both Houses, very likely it will not be worth while to interrupt the Senate by the reading.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from New York the propriety of amending the title. I observe that since the adoption of the Revised Statutes it is the habit to introduce bills to amend a certain section of those statutes by number, without the slightest indication of the contents of the section itself. I suggest that the title in this case hardly indicates anything of the subject-matter of the bill, and that there should be something in the title more than the mere number of the section to show to what it relates.

Mr. CONKLING. I am glad the Senator from Massachusetts has called attention to this subject. I quite agree with him, and I venture to add one suggestion to that which he has made. It is quite the fashion to entitle bills, an act to correct a mistake in the Revised Statutes. Doubtless there are a great many mistakes in the Revised Statutes; but I do not think it is a good fashion every time it turns out to be desirable to have a section otherwise, to denominate the act a correction of the Revised Statutes. My impression is that in a large number of these instances the truth is that the Revised Statutes have truly condensed and presented in epitome the law as it stood; but every man who sits down to draw a bill to change anything in the Revised Statutes by a sort of common custom says it is to correct a mistake or error in the Revised Statutes. I am not at all sure that this is an error in the Revised Statutes, and I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, as the title comes last, (which he knows better than I,) that if he will suggest any amendment to that, I shall have no objection whatever, and I think if we would also change the titles of all such bills by describing them as doing something else than to correct errors in these statutes, except where we know there is an error, that would be an improvement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend the Revised Statutes touching vice-consuls general."

S. J. GHOLSON.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask the Senate to take up from the table House bill No. 1343.

The bill (H. R. No. 1343) to relieve S. J. Gholson, of Mississippi, of his political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution was read twice.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask for the present consideration of this bill; and I will state that Mr. Gholson sent a petition not only to the House but to the Senate, which is now with the Judiciary Committee. They have not reported upon this petition, but I have no doubt they will report favorably.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Would it not be well to have the bill referred to them?

Mr. ALCORN. I would ask, inasmuch as the House has passed this bill after considering his petition, and inasmuch as he has also petitioned the Senate, (and that petition is before our Judiciary Committee and in proper form,) that the bill be considered without further delay. He is quite an old man, and is nervous about this matter.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I ought to say that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is absent at this moment, a liberty which he does not take in excess, for he is usually here. The Senator from Mississippi says that there is a petition in this case before the committee. The committee has not considered it and has had no notice that this motion was to be made. I do not like, of course, to interpose an objection which looks like one especially aimed at the request of the Senator. I think, however, that bills of this sort, like other bills pertaining appropriately to a committee and the subject being before that committee ought not, except for cogent reasons, to be taken up without action of the committee and in the absence of the chairman and without notice to the committee, for the disposition of the Senate. It seems to tend in the direction of superseding the use of committees in that respect in which they are supposed to be most valuable and most likely to act as safeguards. Of course, I have no feeling about this particular case, but I should think it better to let it take the ordinary direction.

Mr. ALCORN. I have only to say in reply that I believe it is the uniform custom of Congress in all cases where a petition is made, setting forth the fact of disabilities, and asking the Government to remove them, and pledging the support of the applicant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, to respond favorably. In this case a petition was referred in the House of Representatives; the party sent his application here also, which is in due form. I called the attention of some members of the Judiciary Committee to it. I did not, it is true, give notice that I would call up this bill, for I did not think it was necessary to do so. I thought it was one of those cases that were out of the ordinary course of adjudication by the Senate. If the Senator desires to have it referred to the committee, I am willing certainly to have that done.

Several SENATORS. That would be better.

Mr. ALCORN. Very well, I have no objection; because the opposition is such that it would not now be considered. Unless the Senator from New York will withdraw his opposition, I will yield the floor to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is upon the Calendar a bill to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida, which has been reported from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I have interposed all the opposition I have to the bill if it be opposition; it is rather to the custom of ousting the jurisdiction of a committee. I know not what the chairman of the committee may know about this bill. Of course, like every other chairman of a committee, it is he, and not the other members of the committee, who have charge in the main of the business of the committee.

Mr. ALCORN. I will let it go to the committee.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GEORGE S. HAWKINS.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask leave to call up the third bill on the Calendar, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously, to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida. Mr. Hawkins is an old man, who was in Congress many years ago with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and myself. This bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I ask that it be put on its passage.

The bill (S. No. 204) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 219) to permit the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania to retire was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 828) to correct an error in enrollment was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the bill which was under consideration during the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 124) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to Senators who were not here during the last session of Congress that this subject was then considered; my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] debated it at some length, as did others, and various amendments were proposed and offered, and some adopted. The bill as reported is very simple in its object, involves no larger expense in any event than $10,000, and it will satisfy a large portion of the community who are seeking to prevent the evils arising from the sale of intoxicating drinks. It will furnish a vast amount of information, at all events, that will be useful to the Government, not only in imposing our taxes but in governing the District of Columbia and the Territories. There can be to this no constitutional question which cannot be interposed against almost any bill that is offered, because there is no question whatever that the Government of the United States may, under its right to legislate for the District of Columbia and for the Territories, gather all the information that is proposed to be gathered by this bill.

I believe in this case that a report made by sensible men—not by extreme men of either side—presenting the statistics of intemperance, the causes of intemperance, and facts showing whether fermented liquors are as injurious as spirituous liquors or whether they are injurious to the same extent, and all the information that may be gathered on the subject, when collected in proper form and printed, will be a useful and valuable addition to our knowledge on the subject. As it is now, no State can pursue this inquiry because no State has the command of the facilities and statistics necessary to complete information on the subject.

The bill also requires an examination of the laws in other countries intended to prevent intemperance, and the success of those laws, and whether laws prohibiting the sale or manufacture of spirits have tended to promote temperance. In every aspect of the question it seems to me that this information would be valuable, and of much more value than the small cost which would be entailed on the Government of the United States. No one is committed by the report; no one is bound by it; but if the information it shall give us will tend in any way to throw light on our duties in framing our laws, in making our license laws, or imposing taxes, or in regulating the government of this District, or of the Terrritories, we shall be amply repaid for all the cost.

Besides, it will gratify the sentiment of a great body of petitioners, honest men and women who feel that the evil arising from the undue use of spirituous liquors is one of the great evils of humanity. It will gratify them to see that the Congress of the United States is willing to give this subject a fair and dispassionate examination. No officer of the Government can participate in it, and no doubt the President of the United States, in making up this commission, will take intelligent men, well informed upon the subject, dispassionate men, representing both sides of the question, and we shall have a valuable statistical report.

I do not deem it necessary to discuss the matter further. It was discussed at the last session of Congress and a similar bill adopted by a very considerable majority of the Senate. I will leave the bill to rest on that discussion.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the present bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Finance does in substance contain some amendments which were offered by me at the last session, and I mean to propose simply an additional amendment to it, should it be the pleasure of the Senate to pass this bill. At the same time, I take leave to say that in my opinion this is not the way, nor is this the jurisdiction in which this subject should be discussed and controlled.

In the first place, so far as relates to the revenue and taxation derived from alcoholic and fermented liquors, that being a pure question of business, a cold question of dollars and cents, it already has been subjected to test and criticism by the appropriate department of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury and the almost numberless agents under him have the very fullest information in regard to the capacity of these products to bear burdens as well as the other taxable properties of the country. We have bureaus of statistics already in full and expensive operation; we have officials by the thousand from whom every information relating to the question of revenue and taxation as derived from these products can be obtained. These sources are capable of giving the information sought for in this bill far more fully and perfectly than can this commission. See what it is. You propose that it shall exist for but a single year, and that five gentlemen, to be chosen by the President, with the assistance of a single clerk, shall provide statistics which we have already in more than abundance, and of which you can obtain the results by a single resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish them. So far, therefore, as what I may call the legitimate portion of this bill is concerned, the relation of these great products to the revenue and taxation of the country, we have either the information itself already in the hands of the proper official or we have the means of information to be derived from him by the common machinery of a simple resolution of inquiry.

But it would be disguising the truth to say that such was the object of this bill. There is no man in the Senate who believes for a moment that the object of this bill is to learn the amount of revenue derived from these two products as compared with the other taxable businesses of the country. That is not the idea. The meaning of this bill is found rather in the attempt at a moral inquisition, to examine into the "economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects" of the "liquor traffic in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people."

Mr. President, there is no question more interesting, none broader, none more profound in its importance, than the question of the regulation, the use and abuse of intoxicating drinks by our people. No one, I think, can commence the study of such a subject without feeling that it calls for the very greatest powers of generalization, the broadest and most profound powers of reasoning; but it cannot be dealt with safely by legislation based upon sentimentality. There is a domain of morals and there is a domain of law. Wherever laws undertake to invade the domain of morals and base themselves upon such a doctrine but little success can be expected from the result. The world's history shows that but little success has come from such attempts. The domain of morals is not that of legislation. Sound and wise legislation may tend to good morals; but that governments may regulate morals by law I believe will be found to be true to a very limited extent.

Now, there is a class of very well-meaning persons in this country who, in my opinion, entirely misapprehend the proper method of dealing with the question of intemperance, who are anxious at all times to bring it under the domain of law, and by positively coercive legislation to regulate the question of men's appetites in regard to alcoholic drinks, and to invade the domain of morals by a class of laws known as sumptuary laws, which have in all the history of the world proved worse than failures, and in this country have not met and never will meet, I trust, the approval of the people.

This habit of creating by law a system of mutual inspection, one man by another, upon the tastes and habits of his neighbors is to my mind utterly reprehensible; and as I would oppose it in my own case if directed against me, so I will oppose it in the case of all other men who I think are improperly invaded in regard to matters to be controlled by their own conscience and by their own taste. Should the indulgence of one's own taste lead to an infraction of the law or to an invasion of the rights of any other man, then I would have quick reprehension and punishment for him; and the punishment and the remedy for all such infractions, from the very nature of our federal system, is reposed in the local governments of the States. No man supposes that it is within the power of the United States Government to punish for drunkenness or any of the offenses which drunkenness causes. Those offenses are properly committed for their regulation and punishment to the local laws of the several States. Therefore the proposition of this bill is to invade the distinctive province of the State, the essential province of the State, by absorbing into Federal jurisdiction part of the necessary police powers of the State.

Sir, I am one of those who believe that this aggrandizement of the functions of the Federal Government at the expense of the States is the radical evil of our day and time. I believe it forms to-day the great issue upon which finally will hinge public opinion in this country; and believing that that is a principle and a rule which should be looked to in legislation, and that every law proposed for our consent should be criticised as to whether it tended for or against this doctrine of centralization, I shall look at every measure that comes before me for my vote and be governed very largely by the opinion whether it does so tend or not. In the present case it seems to me clear that it is none of our affair, as a branch of the Federal Congress, to be making investigations unless the results of those investigations are to be the basis of legislation to remedy the evils. All the punishment or regulation of the offenses of intemperance, as I said before, confessedly lies and solely lies within the jurisdiction of the States. For that reason, while, if I were a member of a State Legislature, I would be very glad to have all the statistics tending to show what would be wise or otherwise in legislation upon this subject, thinking that the dealing of the law with this subject is important, that it should not attempt to invade the domain of morals by the form of sumptuary laws; yet, at the same time, as the traffic and sale of intoxicating drinks is a matter that does call for great prudence, discretion, and firmness on the part of the legislator, I should be perfectly willing if this subject were under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government to do anything that would tend to throw light upon it, or make our legislation in regard to it more efficient and valuable.

But I am very sure that every attempt to bring this question of temperance into the political arena will be found disastrous to the cause of good morals, which I am certain we all desire to see enforced. I do not suppose that there are in this Chamber two gentlemen whose minds disagree or whose wishes disagree on this very important subject. The difference between us is as to the means of dealing with it, as to where the power is properly reposed to deal with it, and how far it is proper to exercise that power. I think it could be easily demonstrated by the experience we have already had that this question of the reformation of the vice of intemperance has never been brought into politics without the evil being greatly increased.

I have prepared an amendment which I apprehend will not be objectionable to the honorable Senator from Ohio who has this measure in charge. It is in the twenty-eighth line to insert the words which I find were contained in an amendment offered by me in 1874. The bill now reads:

Also to ascertain whether the evils of drunkenness have been increased or decreased, and whether public morals have been improved thereby.

This is in reference to the effect of restrictive legislation. I propose to insert after the word "thereby" the words "and whether the use of opium as a stimulant and substitute for alcoholic drinks has become more general in consequence of such legislation."

This touches again the question of revenue. It also touches a question which I consider had much better be left to the police power of the States; but at the same time if we are to have the inquiry, and if the question is to be examined in its moral and economic aspects, it is important that this notorious fact should be considered also by this commission who are investigating upon public health, and, as I said, examining the moral and scientific aspects of the case.

I shall vote against the resolution when so amended for the reasons I have given; because, being in my own way, according to my line of belief, an advocate of temperance, having a strong reprobation and horror of the vice of intemperance, I should be false to my convictions of duty if I permitted that which I believe to be an unsound theory upon this subject to stand in the way of the substantial advancement of that which I believe to be the proper way of treating it.

I wish also, if this commission is to be created, that the question should be embraced in its inquiries and considered by it whether the use of light wines, grown now so largely in this country, is not one of the most hopeful grounds for the gradual disuse of alcoholic drinks. We all know enough of the history of other nations to know that where those wines are most preferably used intoxication is almost unknown. It is to be regretted that in preparing a bill of this kind, if the object of it is to give instruction to the American people with regard to the subject, we should not have had that important question embraced with the rest. I do believe, according to all that I have been able to learn, all that I have been able to see, all sources of information that I have been able to obtain, that the substitution as a popular beverage of light wines, that can be so cheaply and abundantly produced all over the United States, in lieu of intoxicating drinks, would be a great blessing to the people and would diminish the terrible vice of drunkenness, from the ravages of which this country suffers so much.

Mr. President, I now submit the amendment I have suggested. I apprehend it will not be objected to by the gentleman in charge of the bill. I think it runs directly in the line of it, and it is found in the amendments offered by me and adopted by the Senate in February, 1874.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "thereby," in line 28 of section 1, it is proposed to insert:

And whether the use of opium as a stimulant and substitute for alcoholic drinks has become more general in consequence of such legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. In regard to the amendment now offered by the Senator from Delaware, I will state that the Committee on Finance did consider that distinct proposition. They thought, on the whole, it was better not to insert it in this bill for this reason: Opium is to some extent useful as a medicine, but when used as a stimulant it is a secret vice, generally disguised and concealed, which it would be very difficult indeed for a committee or commission of this kind to inquire into and trace the evils or the extent of. At all events, it introduces a new subject-matter entirely to the consideration of this commission, not at all connected with the general inquiry, and which would seem to have no bearing upon it; and so it would appear rather to be thrown in, not for the purpose probably, but as having the effect of ridiculing or belittling the general object of the commission. The Committee on Finance may have been in error in this, and if so the Senate will correct it; but that was the view which induced the Committee on Finance to leave out these words, the only material clause in the bill of last session which was omitted. It is for the Senate to say, on the whole, whether it is not better.

I think we ought to give the good people who are endeavoring to cure the evil of intemperance a fair opportunity to present to us all the statistics which bear on that question, leaving the evils that grow out of the use of opium and many other vices and crimes to be examined by some other and different tribunal. I thought, therefore, there was much force in the proposition that the use of opium ought not to be mingled in this question.

In regard to the other point of the Senator from Delaware, I think there is a good deal in it. I do not propose an amendment because I am representing here the committee, but it does seem to me that while we are inquiring into the use of spirituous and malt liquors we might also very properly inquire into the use of vinous liquors; how far they tend to check the consumption of spirituous liquors; how far the use of the light wines of the country may be beneficial, healthful, cheerful, without doing any harm. For myself I should vote for a proposition of that kind. Everything that relates to the subject of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, their uses, their abuses, the resources of revenue from them, I think ought to be referred to this commission, with the hope that they will gather together all the statistics possible, give us the result of all the Maine liquor laws, all the license laws, and all the laws prohibiting, or allowing, or regulating the sale of spirituous liquors in the various States of the Union and the different countries of the world. That is a great object; and when we reflect that the use of spirituous liquors is the cause of two-thirds of the crimes in every country of the world; that it is the cause of te pauperism, poverty, distress known to us all; when we see around us the fairest and brightest men we have ever met in life stricken down by this fell disease, sometimes beyond their control, reduced to beggary and poverty, with wife and children in want; when we know that this vice, if I may so call it, is almost universal, wide-extending, ruinous, it seems to me that the Congress of the United States might well give to the subject the benefit of a full and impartial examination.

I am not among those who have looked on laws prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors as the most effective means of promoting temperance. There may be other remedies that are much better. At the same time, when we are dealing with a subject so great as this, so important as this, when we are dealing with a vice so ruinous in its consequences to those who participate and those who are connected with the parties participating, to the man who sells and the man who consumes, to women and children, it seems to me it is a subject that may fairly demand our attention for a little while, and that we may very fairly appropriate $10,000 to collect together the statistics that bear upon the questions involved.

So far as it affects our own legislation, the framing of our tariff laws, the framing of license laws, the framing of laws for the District of Columbia, there is no doubt whatever of our right and our duty to inquire into the sale of spirituous liquors, in the moral, the scientific, and the economic aspects of the case. The economic bearing it has on the people of this District, and the people of the Territories, is enough to justify our action. I am one of those who believe that this Government of ours has a broader significance than the narrow bounds that are sometimes given to it by the men who are called State-rights men. I believe that anything which clearly promotes the common good and the general welfare we have, at least, a right to inquire about, to report upon, and to spread before the people information that bears upon those subjects. But in the remarks I made a while ago, I carefully avoided disturbing the serenity of my democratic friends. I made no party allusions whatever. The Senator from Delaware said that he was sorry to see this matter made a party measure; that he was sorry indeed to see party topics introduced here.

Mr. BAYARD. I said nothing about party. I spoke of bringing questions of morals into politics.

Mr. SHERMAN. There can be no politics without party. I understood the Senator from Delaware as seeming to think this was a party matter. It has not been so considered by me. The only possible way in which it could be presented as a party measure would be by introducing the Constitution as a barrier to almost all that is good in the way of legislation, as a barrier to the exercise of every power that will tend to promote the common good and the general welfare.

Now, sir, I belong to a school of politics that probably takes a more liberal view of the Constitution of the United States, that holds to the view expressed by Marshall and the other great men whose decisions have been ingrafted into and made a part of our constitutional law, that the grant of a general power carried with it every incident, every necessary measure that in the judgment of Congress may be deemed appropriate to carry into execution the few powers given to the General Government. And therefore when a power is given to us to tax whisky, or beer, or wine, it includes a power to know the effect of these taxes, the products of these taxes, then bearing upon the moral, religious, scientific, and economic interests of all our people. But, sir, in the narrowest view that you can take of this question, there can be no doubt about the power of the General Government to do all that is proposed by this bill.

Now, with regard to amendments, I was struck with the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, that it might be well enough to extend this investigation so as to include an inquiry into the use of wines, especially such wines as he and I would like to drink ourselves, and could drink probably without harm to ourselves if we confined ourselves to moderation. I have no objection to that. It seems to me that when you are examining into the general question of the liquor traffic, it includes all kinds, all grades, all forms of liquor, the juice of the grape as well as the juice of the corn, and the product of fermented processes with hops or barley. I should therefore vote for that proposition if the Senator would offer it; but I do not think it would be right and proper to introduce the opium question, much more a Chinese in its general bearing than an American question. I do not think it proper to introduce that subject into this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am not altogether surprised that the Senator from Ohio cannot hear of politics without thinking that party politics are the only things in question. I spoke of bringing a question of a sumptuary nature into the domain of politics. I did not refer to party at all, because I know that on this particular subject there runs through both parties a feeling against the proposition he has interposed; but I am not surprised that he should think that there was but one kind of politics.

But, sir, he strangely misapprehended me if he supposed that I had any design in offering this amendment to cast any ridicule on this subject. Indeed, I do not see upon what he founded the remark. It was not found in the language of the amendment, which is in ordinary and proper terms. It certainly was not in my manner or any words used by me in discussion. I spoke gravely upon this subject. I felt gravely upon it. I feel quite as gravely upon it as he does; and I am quite as quick, I think, to state my views and to sustain them by my votes in accordance with what I believe to be right. I believe that the method of treating this subject which has been apparently favored by the Senator from Ohio is disastrous; that it will do more harm than good. I do not choose to vie with the Senator in my expressions of denunciation and abhorrence of all the misery and all the crime that is caused by miserable self-indulgence by men in alcoholic drinks. Certain it is, if all those facts which he speaks of as being so certain and well-ascertained do exist, there is nothing more to be asked for; and then the Congress of the United States, if it has the power, has the responsibility of dealing with such a vice as in some way to arrest and check it, if legislation may do it. That is precisely the whole question: "if legislation may do it." It has been tried all over the world in different ways, and under different forms of government, and I supposed that by this time it had been found out that that which is born in human nature may be regulated, but cannot be suppressed.

Now, sir, the examination of the relative use of the stimulant of opium in all its shapes with the use of alcoholic and fermented drinks is so far from being a Chinese question that I am sorry to say it is formidably an American question. I have thought of this subject; I have studied this subject with a very earnest desire to arrive at correct opinions in regard to it and to benefit the unhappy victims of these vices; and I say now to the Senator from Ohio, if he did not know it before, that any respectable physician, either in the large cities of this country or in the small towns of the country, will tell him that, when you have by coercive laws prevented the sale and use as a beverage of intoxicating liquors, you instantly have caused a most terrible increase in the use of opium as a stimulant; and, being more secretly sold, and to women and to children, it is capable of more secret use, and it is far more deleterious in its results. I say that, when you propose to examine the question of intoxication upon the ground of public morals and public health and you find that the disuse or prohibition of the use of those drinks is followed inevitably by a recourse to a far worse species of stimulus, you turn your back upon your duty, and you show that you are not hearty in the performance of that duty when you do not make an inquiry which ought to be made, and which ought to be made a subject of coincident examination.

That is about all that I meant to say. If any man wants to understand the bearings of this subject, if he wishes to have statistics which will be of information and guidance to him, so that he may arrive at a sound opinion, whether as a citizen or a legislator, I say that he cannot get it unless he considers the subject which I have moved as an amendment in connection with the rest of the bill. It is all-important that we should know with whom we are dealing—imperfect human creatures, born with appetites so difficult to regulate and control; and if you stop the exercise of one you create another; surely these are questions that should be examined together. It may be a choice of evils, it may be a necessity of considering together joint evils with the purpose of regulating and controlling both or either; but we certainly ought to know the facts. If the Senator had some friend, some relative, in whose health and happiness he felt a brotherly and friendly regard, and this man was the victim of diseased appetite in respect of alcohol, and he induced him, or persuaded or enforced his abandonment of that thing, and then found that, when he had abandoned the alcohol, he took refuge in opium, he would find that it would be a choice of evils, terrible to be made, but, at the same time, he would have to deal with both together, and he would have to disregard the existence of the most important part of the truth in dealing with such a case, if he acted as is now proposed here.

I submit to the Senator that he but little understood my motive or my feeling in offering this amendment when he suggested that it was intended in anything like ridicule or disrespect. The amendment has nothing in it of the kind, and nothing that I said, in tone or manner or feeling, could have justified such an idea. I am very much impressed with this subject. I do not believe this way of dealing with it is going to promote a cure. If I thought so I might vote for it, even though I have those scruples which do not seem to affect the Senator. I am one of those people whom he calls "State-rights men." I know I am. That is my conscience; that is part of my political creed. I believe this country will not exist when the States cease to exist. I believe, as Judge Nelson said, that we shall pass from out the family of nations when the autonomy of the States is lost. And, whether it be popular at the moment now to decry what is called "State rights" or not, I believe that the existence of this country and the permanence of this Government rest on a due respect of the rights of the States; and on this subject I may say that all the cures which may be looked to for these alleged abuses in the use of vinous, spirituous, or fermented liquors properly belong to the police powers of the communities who suffer from them. They have the undoubted power; they have the undoubted will; and I am content to leave it there, and not to exercise a more than doubtful power by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator let me ask him a question? It may seem to him rather useless, although I answer for its bearing upon the measure of course. Will the Senator state to me, what in his view, is the limit practicably on the power of legislative inquiry? I do not speak now of what may be done with this information; but I ask the Senator, in other words so that he may understand my request: Except something be found in the inhibitions against searches and seizures, invasion of houses or papers, or the like, where is the limit of the right of a legislative body to inquire for legislative purposes?

Mr. BAYARD. As I stated before, unless the inquiry is to be made the basis of legislation there is no use in it.

Mr. CONKLING. Ah! Will the Senator pardon me one moment? That may be, and I did not mean to trouble him with that question. I thought he was discussing not the expediency but the power; and as a matter of power, I would like to know whether the Senator thinks that there is any practical limit to the authority of a legislative body to inquire merely until they come, as I say, to invade individual rights of persons or their houses or papers?

Mr. BAYARD. It would seem to me the answer is very easy. Unless the inquiry is directed to matters within the jurisdiction of the body inquiring, I should call the inquiry simply impertinent; I mean in a legislative and legal sense. It does not devolve upon them.

Mr. CONKLING. Even though they were powerless?

Mr. BAYARD. I believe the fact would be even so in that case, and it would be as improper, I believe, as an inquisition by the Senate of the United States into my private house or into my domestic affairs, I may say as a mere question of inquiry about what I stated or omitted to state, as to what I ate or drank or what mode of life I led. You have the physical power to pass such a resolution, but I should here declare it, and the country would declare it, and the Senator from New York would declare it to be impertinent. So, too, if I thought that this inquiry could be followed up by legislation of a constitutional character, I might say it was a matter of expediency, but I do say there is a limit to the inquiry unless the results of that inquiry are to be made the basis of laws. Otherwise we are wasting time. We are simply not attending to our own business, but to that of other people. The question, I believe, is on the amendment which I submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE. The bill before the Senate is one which I had the honor to introduce myself, but as I did that at the special request of others, I do not feel any special duty resting upon myself or any special interest in the fate of the bill other than that which grows out of my appreciation of its importance to the general interests of society. I should hope, however, that the Senate of the United States would not decline to make the very small appropriation proposed in the pending bill. It seems to me that almost all of the argument submitted to the Senate by the Senator from Delaware against the passage of this bill is quite premature. His argument might be otherwise if we had a bill before us proposing by some means or in some way to restrict or restrain or increase the production or the consumption of intoxicating liquors. When we come to the practical work of legislating here, either on behalf of temperance or drunkenness, perhaps the argument of the Senator from Delaware will be in place. We have no such proposition submitted to us to-day. I can myself conceive of a great many bills which might be proposed here, either to promote temperance or to promote drunkenness, to which I should be opposed. I cannot very well imagine a bill that might be proposed here to promote drunkenness that I would be very heartily in favor of. One of the few convictions I have attained to up to this period of my life is that that particular exercise known as drunkenness does not need any promotion. It is rather thrifty than otherwise. I should be inclined to say of it what Mr. Artemus Ward said of Shakespeare's grave; that it was a "success." Drunkenness is entirely successful. But I can conceive of many bills which might be offered here for the promotion of temperance (a quality, or a virtue if you please to be liberal enough to recognize it as a virtue, not altogether so successful and which needs some promotion) that I might favor; and yet I can conceive a bill which might be offered for the promotion of temperance that I would not be in favor of.

This bill proposes nothing of either kind. It proposes to put the Government of the United States in communication with some public-spirited gentlemen who may be selected from the whole forty million making up our constituency—men specially adapted to the work of inquiry—to put the Government in communication with those men who tell you they will work for nothing and find themselves if you will simply make the selection from the whole number who are willing to work for nothing and find themselves, and will simply provide for paying a clerk to record the testimony they may collect, and will pay for their expenditures in collecting testimony—that is all—that they may lay before the Government of the United States such evidence as they may collect from the whole world touching the relations of the people of the United States and of its several governments, both State and Federal, to this thing of manufacturing and trading in and drinking down distilled and fermented liquors.

The Senator from Delaware says that if he were a member of a State Legislature he would want this information. Very well; it would cost just as much to get the information on behalf of a single State as it will cost us to get the information for the benefit of all the States in the Union. If the Senator deems it important for the Legislature of one State to have this information, it is of equal importance to the legislation of every other State. If as a member of the Legislature of a State he would incur the expense of procuring this information for the benefit of that Legislature, he can by voting for this bill procure the same information for the benefit of all the States. This is the most economical mode, then, of collecting it. What objection, therefore, can he possibly have to voting this appropriation unless he is disposed to stand upon that other objection which he at first hinted, to wit, the want of power on the part of Congress to make the appropriation? He has already abandoned, if I understood him, that objection. He admits that Congress has power to make the appropriation; but it is impertinent, he thinks, for Congress to make the appropriation. Why more impertinent for this Legislature to make the appropriation and to get the information than for the Legislature of a State to make it? It seems to me, if it be impertinent for one Legislature to get the information, it is impertinent for all.

I say again we are not confronting the question whether we will legislate to restrict the use or to restrict the manufacture of these beverages. The simple question is whether we will make a small and utterly insignificant appropriation of money to enable public-spirited men to lay before us evidence tending to show whether we may legislate upon it, and tending to show in what direction, if any, we may legislate. I shall vote for the passage of the bill with a great deal of pleasure and a great deal of alacrity.

As to the particular amendment moved by the Senator from Delaware, I care but very little whether it be agreed to or not. In voting upon it I shall vote against it, following the advice of the Committee on Finance. I conceive that the abuse referred to by the amendment is one much more difficult to investigate than the one mentioned in the bill. That refers not to a private abuse but to a public one, not to an insignificant one but to a stupendous one. That refers to an abuse which unquestionably entails upon society more misery, more crime, and entails upon government more cost than any other one, and probably more than all of the social abuses put together; and in that point of view I think it may be well worth while to make a slight inquiry into its exact dimensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. Insert after the word "thereby," in line 28, the following:

> And whether the use of opium as a stimulant and substitute for alcoholic drinks has become more general in consequence of such legislation.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My attention was called to this proposition a few moments ago, and I have a word or two to say in regard to it. I am, I suppose, rather constitutionally, at any rate by education and sympathy, what may be called a State-rights man, and so I like to examine any question which it is said involves inquiry into the rights of a State, and, further, that is in any sense incongruous with the rights and privileges which a State ordinarily may be expected to exercise. While I think that this particular question, the suppression of intoxicating drinks, speaking of the whole question, does primarily belong to the States, and, like the education of the people, their morals, and whatever pertains to their domestic affairs, does belong to that great body of powers which lies in the States, at the same time I conceive that this has a relation to the whole country, and particularly to the exercise of the powers of the Government here, which in my view justify this inquiry. My point is that it is, if justified, authorized, and I think required, by the policy of the Government in regard to the tax upon alcoholic drinks. Nothing is clearer than that the action of the Government in attempting to collect or in collecting a large revenue, $70,000,000, more or less, upon distilled spirits in this country and on the importation of distilled spirits from abroad, has a very vital, general sweeping influence upon the people of this country, upon their morals, upon their welfare in almost every sense. In that view I cannot doubt that it is germane to the general power of taxation, raising a revenue upon the employment, or vocation, or occupation, or whatever you call it, of distilled spirits, for the Congress of the United States to inquire into the effect, morally, socially, and economically, of the results of that action. On that question I have fixed opinions, from an inquiry made into this matter some twenty years ago—no; not quite as long as that, for that would make me older than I fancy myself to be; but fifteen years ago at least. I remember with distinctness, as though it were but yesterday, the conclusion I came to after a most labored examination into this precise question. The question is not new at all. We had almost this identical question as early as 1795, when the country was in the dilemma of a large national debt. When the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamilton, was casting about for the means of sustaining the public credit, one of the methods resorted to was the identical thing we are doing now; that is, to raise a revenue upon the importation and distillation of alcoholic drinks, accompanied also, I believe, by a system of licenses for the retail sale of alcoholic drinks so manufactured in this country or imported from abroad. Therefore it becomes of the utmost consequence to inquire what was the effect of that policy upon the morals of the people. How did it come to be that about that period we came to be denominated a nation of drunkards? How was it that it was generally asserted, and is a matter of history to-day, that the American Colonies at the close or the war, and for the first two decades afterward, drank more liquor per capita than any other people on the face of the globe? It has usually been accounted for from the pernicious effects of the war, the sacrifices and sufferings of the people, connected with the war. That is the tendency of war, and it had that tendency here; but it was not the prime cause. Whoever will take the pains to look into our history, particularly on this point, will find that, more than all things together, it sprang from the policy of raising a revenue out of the distillation of alcoholic drinks and the Government taking into its own hands the retail trade of the country in alcoholic and intoxicating drinks. I think I know what I am talking about, and I feel perfectly confident in challenging contradiction to the proposition; and the early history of the country in regard to these facts will demonstrate it, that, more than all things put together, for the next fifteen or twenty years after that policy was inaugurated, this was the effect of it.

I have before me a volume of the legislative and executive documents of the Congress of the United States from the first session of the First Congress. I have only had a few moments to look at it, and was able to refer to it only by the recollection which remained to me of the discussion which arose in my State on this question some years ago. Looking at it for the facts bearing particularly on this proposition, I find this condition of things as to the result. Here is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1795:

> A statement of the revenue arising on licenses granted to retailers of wines and foreign distilled spirits within the United States for one year, commencing on the 1st day of October, 1794, and ending on the 30th day of September, 1795.

The number of wine licenses that year was three thousand two hundred and three. The number of spirit licenses was seven thousand four hundred and sixty-one. The amount of duties, $54,731. I do not know precisely when this financial policy was inaugurated. Perhaps the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance may be able to state in what year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not earlier than 1792, I fancy.

Mr. SHERMAN. Seventeen hundred and ninety-one or 1792.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, 1791 or 1792. Glancing at this report here in the Senate, I have not been able to find the years which antedate this; but this shows the condition of things at that time. Turning these pages you will find this condition of things rapidly increasing; year by year the number of licenses for wine and the number of licenses for distilled spirits, and of course the amount collected, increase in rapid ratio, larger quantities of liquors being imported and distilled annually, a larger number of licenses granted, in great disproportion to the increase of population, until, in 1800, you find this condition of things:

> Of the proceeds of those duties more than $500,000 arise from the tax on distillation, $372,000 of which are paid by 22,000 country stills scattered over the immense territory of the United States; $65,000 are the product of 13,000 retailers' licenses.

They had increased from no distillations at all in this country in 1790 up to 22,000 country stills. In the early part of this volume you will find the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamilton, in regard to his policy of sustaining the public credit, looking simply at that—not looking at the consequence upon the public morals or the health or economical conditions of the people—and he asks "Why should we be selling imported liquors? Why not let our people have the benefit of this whole thing?"

So you will see that in ten years we had 22,000 country stills. Of course the Government had taken the control and direction of the licenses of the retail trade of the country; and where was precisely our authority for that I cannot understand. If my honorable friend from Delaware will address himself to that subject, I think he may find a little difficulty in precisely explaining on what ground it is that the Government of the United States should open tippling-shops in every part of the country. But that is not the question we are considering. This report shows that in the year 1800 there were 13,000 retail licenses, all grown up within a single decade under this policy of the Government.

Now, is it worth while for me to stand here and argue to the Senate of the United States the consequence of all that? May I not appeal to the general history of the country, known to us all, that intemperance did keep steady progres with this fundamental, cardinal fact, until it came to pass that we were denominated over the civilized world as a nation of drunkards?

I remember to have had occasion to follow a little further this question of license, this question of the Government of the country undertaking to license, to interfere, to meddle with a thing of this sort—licensing it and so giving it the moral power and encouragement of its authority. Looking at England you will find precisely the same condition of things to have existed. I took a series of two decades following this financial policy, because it was a matter of financial policy in England and in this country independent of, reckless of its consequences on the people, and I found this general condition of things: Wherever and whenever the government of Great Britain encouraged the importation of alcoholic drinks from other countries, because it was taking very little or none of its own, retail shops were opened; and as the retail trade was prospering, so you found drunkenness rife, so you found pauperism increasing, so you found the criminal courts and prisons filled. That is the history of it, and it is all as natural as it is for water to run down hill. It must be so. Whenever the Government lends its moral countenance to and encourages the importation and the production, of course you cannot, Senators will see that it is impossible to control the sale. It becomes popular, it is taken out from under the ban at once, and it increases everywhere. That, I think, is the historical account in this country and elsewhere. It is the natural, it is the irresistible effect.

Now, what are we doing? We are collecting on imported and distilled liquors in this country about $70,000,000, more or less—I do not undertake to be accurate—of revenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. We distilled 70,000,000 gallons last year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The distillations under our encouragement and countenance are, say, 70,000,000 gallons, and we are a people of 40,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the amount returned on which tax was paid was 70,000,000 gallons. There was some "crooked" whisky that did not pay the tax.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know the amount of crooked whisky, but I should suppose the distillation was not less than 100,000,000 gallons at least. Now, just think of 100,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits for a people of 40,000,000 in addition to all that is imported from abroad. What becomes of it? It is doctored and medicated, rectified and refined, into all the shapes that human ingenuity can conceive, and the people are doctored with it and poisoned with it, the effect of all which is pauperism, crime, destitution, beggary, want, death. The statistics show, beyond all controversy, if anything has ever been made clear by statistics, that three-fourths of the pauperism is attributable directly and indirectly to intoxicating drinks and three-fourths of the crime to the same cause. Just contemplate that statement, and then see whether the Government of a country that raises its revenues by the encouragement of the distillation of such an agency as that has no connection with it, and no right to inquire into it, and no interest to inquire into it! Why, sir, more than all other agencies combined is the terrible effect of alcoholic drinks upon the health and morals and prosperity of this people. It is the gigantic crime of crimes in this age, and particularly in this country.

Mr. President, it were not possible, I know, that we should collect this amount of our revenues by levying it on the property of the people directly. I do not suppose that it would be considered a reasonable matter of finance; but I have never seen the time since I have been in the Senate that I would not have voted this amount of revenue either upon the polls, or estate, or upon the incomes of the people, to raise this much money, and put this whole business of retailing alcoholic drinks or intoxicating liquors under the ban of the nation. I can have no doubt myself that it is entirely legitimate, that it is entirely constitutional, to raise this commission, and that, if it should turn out that it makes a thorough investigation into the whole question, it cannot in the future but be beneficent to the country.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he expects to reach a vote on this bill shortly. If not, I suggest that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to an executive session.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 24, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at thirteen minutes after twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the calling of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for printing and reference.

Before this call begins, the Chair will request the House to consent that the call shall proceed this morning until it is completed, without reference to the termination of the morning hour. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The call will therefore proceed until all the States and Territories have been called.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HALE, by request, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1349) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States;'" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions on leave has now been completed.

STRAW BIDS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. STONE. I offer the preamble and resolutions which I send to the desk for immediate action, and I move that the rules be suspended and the preamble and resolutions adopted.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolutions, as follows:

Whereas the Postmaster-General of the United States, in his annual report to Congress dated November 15, 1875, (pages 23 and 24,) states that "the officers of this Department are subjected to great annoyance and the Department itself to great pecuniary loss by the prevalent system of 'straw-bidding' on long and expensive routes;" that "several stringent laws have been enacted with a view to the eradication of the evil, but they have signally failed to accomplish the desired result, interested parties, in the teeth of oaths and penalties, still combining together and employing various devices to prevent fair competition and to secure undue advantages by fraud;" and that this evil "annually involves the Department in the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars;" and whereas, on the 25th day of July, 1874, an article was published in the Chicago Times, calling attention to the method of one John J. Safely, of Ottumwa, Iowa, of weighing the United States mails transported by railroad companies, and on the 10th day of December, 1875, the said John J. Safely, in a memorial to this House, inclosed a copy of said articles, and asked that the charges be investigated; and whereas the Postmaster-General of the United States, in his annual report dated November 14, 1874, (pages 28 and 29,) calls attention to the annual deficiency of the Post-Office Department, as follows: "The deficiency of this Department has varied of late years from 15 to 20 per cent., while from the best data at my command I have been compelled to submit estimates for the year ending June 30, 1876, which will show an expected excess of expenditures over receipts of nearly eight million dollars, or about 25 per cent. of the entire revenues of the Department. How far the American people will be willing to go in this direction remains to be seen;" and in his annual report for 1875 (pages 28 and 29) estimates the deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, at 19.39 per cent.; and whereas, by the act of July 2, 1836, provision is made for the appointment of an Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, to "receive all accounts arising in said Department or relative thereto, to audit and settle the same, and certify their balances to the Postmaster-General:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be directed to investigate the charge that the system of straw-bidding "annually involves the Department in the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars;" the origin and extent to which that system prevails or has prevailed; whether or not illegal and extravagant mail contracts have been made of late years, through which, together with the various devices adopted by the beneficiaries of such contracts and of the straw-bid system, to secure increased compensation and pay for service never performed, the Government has been defrauded of millions of dollars, as alleged by the press; and whether or not such losses would have been possible without the knowledge or collusion of officials of the Post-Office Department, postmasters, and others in authority; what efforts, if any, have been made by the Postmaster-General or his agents to break up the system of "straw-bidding" to prosecute those engaged or alleged to have been engaged in it, or who are or have been the beneficiaries of that system; whether any person has been prosecuted for conspiracy or fraud in connection with mail contracts, or has escaped prosecution, there being evidence of his guilt, and the reason for any such failure to prosecute; whether or not any evidence has been developed showing that postmasters, officers, or employés of the Post-Office Department have received money, presents, or any other valuable consideration whatsoever from mail contractors with whose business or accounts they had or could have any connection; and whether or not any such officer or employé is still in the service of the Post-Office Department, and, if so, why, or has been criminally prosecuted, and, if not prosecuted, the reason why; whether or not the beneficiaries of the "straw-bid system" and other contractors have been specially favored by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department in irregular settlement of their accounts, and enabled to evade the law prohibiting the assignment or transfer of mail contracts through the recognition by said Auditor of irrevocable powers of attorney; and whether or not injustice has been done the Government or individuals by the recognition of such powers of attorney, or in the irregular settlement of claims or accounts by said Auditor, and, if such settlements have been made, why made, and through what influence.

And be it further resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department be directed to investigate the charge that one John J. Safely, employed by railroad companies to weigh the United States mails transported by said companies, had a system of weighing by which such increased compensation was obtained as warranted the payment to him of large sums of money for his services; the charge that the "Safely method" had for one of its features the transfer of through mails from a line of railroads which had weighed mails for a re-adjustment of pay to a parallel road which was then weighing or about to weigh mails, so that two or more roads might be paid for transporting the same mail; whether or not such transfers were made or were possible without the knowledge or collusion of officials or employés of the Post-Office Department; whether or not said Safely was assisted in carrying out his arrangements with railway companies by any official or employé of the Post-Office Department, or other person acting as attorney for or in the interest of any Government official, or ex-official, or claiming to so act; whether or not corruption or extravagance in making contracts or in the collection or expenditure of the revenues of the Post-Office Department has tended to cause the large deficiencies in the revenues of that Department of "late years;" and if the expenditures cannot be curtailed without detriment to public interests; whether or not the manner of keeping and adjusting the accounts of the Post-Office Department by the Auditor of the Treasury for that Department exhibits the exact condition of those accounts at the close of each fiscal year and if said Auditors's Office is a check upon the irregular settlement of accounts or claims, provided such settlements have been or should be authorized by the Postmaster-General.

The question was taken on Mr. STONE's motion, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the preamble and resolutions were adopted.

IMPROVEMENT OF RIVERS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1555) for the improvement of the Altamaha and Ocmulgee Rivers, in the State of Georgia, between the cities of Macon and Darien; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a bill (H. R. No. 1556) for the improvement of the Yellow River, in the State of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a bill (H. R. No. 1557) for the improvement of the Ocmulgee River, in the State of Georgia, above the city of Darien; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PROCEEDS OF CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move that the rules be so suspended as to enable me to submit and the House to adopt the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas under an act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in the insurrectionary districts within the United States," the proceeds of a large amount of captured and abandoned property were covered into the Treasury of the United States, a large proportion of which was unlawfully seized by the agents of the Treasury Department after the 30th day of June, 1865, the total amount received from these sources being over twenty millions of dollars, and that which was seized after the 30th of June, 1865, was, by the fifth section of the act of 18th of May, 1872, directed to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the lawful owners thereof; and whereas it appears by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to the present session of Congress that since the passage of said last-mentioned act there has been paid to claimants under said act but the small sum of $180,358.43; and whereas it further appears that under various acts and resolutions of Congress the amount of $347,000 has been appropriated to defend claims made under said acts against the United States, to wit: Resolution of March 30, 1868, $75,000; act of April 10, 1869, $25,000; act of April 20, 1870, $40,000; act of July 15, 1870, $60,000; act of May 18, 1872, $30,000; act of ——, 1870, $1,000; act of ——, 1870, $20,000; act of June, 1872, $30,000; act of March 3, 1873, $30,000; act of June, 1874, $30,000; act of March 3, 1875, $6,000; and it does not appear how or in what manner these sums, aggregating $347,000, have been used; and whereas it appears that a division known as that of the division having in charge the proceeds of captured and abandoned property has been organized in the Treasury Department, with chief and other clerks and employés at high salaries amounting to over $12,000 per annum, and which, with the salaries paid to attorneys representing the Government, amount to annual expense exceeding the sums paid to the judges and clerk of the Court of Claims; and whereas the management and distribution of said fund, from its large amount and other considerations, require that it should be economically taken care of and supervised by men of unquestioned character and intelligence: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House: First, by what authority of law said division of the Treasury Department known as "the division having charge of the proceeds of captured and abandoned property" was formed, how many clerks are employed therein, at what salary each, and under what appropriation they receive their compensation. Second, by what authority of law J. S. Frazer is employed to adjudicate cotton claims, when employed, at what rate of compensation, and what length of time he is or has been absent since the date of his employment. Third, to whom and for what services, and when and where rendered, have the appropriations amounting to $347,000, as hereinbefore cited, or any part thereof, been paid. Fourth, whether the chief clerk of said division is not M. L. Noerr, who, previous to his appointment in said division, was in the employ of the detective department; and whether the clerk second in position in said division is not William Fessenden, and the same individual who held a position in the Army of the United States and was dismissed therefrom for embezzlement of a large sum of money, and do not these parties have charge of all the records of the United States pertaining to claims for captured and abandoned property. Fifth, whether any former officer of the Treasury Department who had any control or knowledge of the facts in connection with the proceeds of captured and abandoned property in the Treasury of the United States has been employed to represent parties having claims against said proceeds; if so, who is said officer, and what amount of claims has he represented or does he now represent.

The question was upon the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the preamble and resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman if he has any objection to submitting the resolution without the preamble. The preamble recites so many facts and figures that I apprehend the House will hardly be able to understand them from this reading. I presume there is no objection to the inquiry, but I am opposed to committing the House to the entire statements contained in the preamble.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The preamble simply refers to the laws of the United States relating to the subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not commit us to the doctrine of refunding the cotton tax by a simple resolution of inquiry concerning the conduct of the Treasury Department.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It does not do that.

Mr. KASSON. I presume there will be no objection to the inquiry if the House is not committed to the statements contained in the preamble.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] insist on his motion?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes, sir.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and agreeing to the preamble and resolution, there were—ayes 100, noes 59.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. If the rules are not suspended the resolution is not before the House.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to hear the resolution read again.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire that the entire paper shall be read?

Mr. HOAR. I think it proper that it should all be read. I do not believe that twenty members will vote for it if they listen to it.

The preamble and resolution were again read.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In order to save the time of the House I withdraw the preamble.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope this batch of personalities may be sent to a committee.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is not a "batch of personalities." The highest interests of the country demand the adoption of this proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that the proper course for him is to make charges and have them referred to a committee for investigation. I submit that it is unworthy the dignity of the House to put these questions about individuals in this way.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The records of the country show that what is there alleged is true. I hold in my hand a report of a committee of this House on this subject.

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I withdraw the preamble.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will consent that that part of the resolution referring to Mr. Fessenden may be modified by inserting the words "it is alleged."

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will insert those words. But an official record coming from the gentleman's own committee in a former Congress is the foundation for those charges.

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The preamble is now withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it not too late to amend when the House is dividing?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has not been received. The rules have not been suspended.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But the House is dividing on that question.

The SPEAKER. The House is not dividing. The gentleman from Tennessee, having withdrawn the preamble, now moves a suspension of the rules to adopt the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. As this is a new proposition, we are entitled to have it read again.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 138, noes 77; less than two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITTHORNE and Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 94, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, Barnum, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Walker, Willshire, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodworth—36.

So the rules were not suspended, (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.)

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that that body had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

A bill (S. No. 63) fixing the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada; and

A bill (S. No. 160) for the relief S. K. Thompson.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. KELLEY moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House what amount of specie was in the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1875, designating the amount of gold and silver respectively; also the amount of silver purchased under the provisions of the act approved January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," stating the date of the several purchases, the price paid for each, and what amount of the cost of any of such purchase of silver has been paid for from surplus revenue in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and what amount of five per cent. bonds bearing gold interest have been sold or disposed of for the purpose of providing means for the payment for said silver, the date of the several issues of said bonds respectively, the amount of interest that has been paid thereon, and the amount that will have accrued but remain unpaid on the day preceding the date of the report made in response to this resolution.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION ACT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to suspend the rules and put on its passage a bill to amend the pension act of February 14, 1871, by striking out "proof of loyalty."

The bill, which was read, provides that section 1 of the act granting pensions to the survivors of the soldiers of the war of 1812, approved February 14, 1871, be amended by striking out so much of said section as excludes from the benefit of the law those who adhered to the enemies of the Government.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That bill passed this House at the last session of Congress, but failed to receive favorable action in the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that without reference to the section of the Revised Statutes the bill would be ineffectual, the Revised Statutes having superseded the old act. Under the circumstances I think it had better be referred to a committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The same bill passed this House during the last Congress by a two-thirds vote, the other side of the House voting for it on both occasions when it was under consideration.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody is opposed to the bill, but it refers to the old law, which has been repealed by the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will modify the bill by referring to the section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman had better withdraw his bill for the present and bring it up again.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement, with the permission of the House. The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812 have unanimously agreed to a general bill in relation to such pensions, and one of its provisions is precisely that offered in the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia. I am assured by the chairman of the committee that the whole bill will be before this House to be put on its passage either on Wednesday or Thursday next.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I withdraw the bill under the circumstances.

ROBERT RANSOM, OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill (H. R. No. 1558) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the bill was passed.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

Mr. WILLARD moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the solicitation of appointments to office and removals therefrom by Senators and members of Congress tends to embarrass the proper exercise of the executive functions of the Government, to impair the independence of the legislative department, and impose upon it duties not properly belonging thereto, and to confuse and intermingle powers and responsibilities which it was the evident intention of the Constitution to keep distinct, and is therefore an evil which should be repressed by suitable measures of legislation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be instructed to inquire what measures of legislation are necessary for the accomplishment of this purpose, and to report to this House at an early day by bill or otherwise.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

PACIFIC MAIL SUBSIDY.

Mr. MORRISON moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the papers laid before this House by the Clerk thereof in relation to the testimony taken before the Committee of Ways and Means (of the Forty-third Congress) "upon the question of the corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy in the China mail service" be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire what action should be taken by the House in reference to the persons now members of this House charged with complicity in the said alleged corrupt use of money for the purpose aforesaid or with giving false testimony in relation thereto, and report to the House.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

IMPROVEMENT OF YAZOO AND SUNFLOWER RIVERS, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SINGLETON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1559) making appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Yazoo and Sunflower Rivers, in the State of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and report, by bill or otherwise, upon the expediency of providing by law that the Commissioner of Agriculture, in place of the annual report heretofore printed for distribution, shall publish a monthly agricultural report, uniform in size and in style with the Patent-Office Gazette, containing such original articles and information as have heretofore been included in his general annual report, and providing for the distribution of the same free of postage to all persons paying a reasonable annual compensation therefor, not exceeding the cost of the paper and printing thereof.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARLEM RIVER.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask that by unanimous consent the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which I presented this morning, be ordered to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is it lengthy?

Mr. WILLIS. It is very brief.

Mr. COX. What is it about?

Mr. WILLIS. It is about the improvement of the Harlem River, and it contains some eight or ten printed lines. It is a very important subject-matter, and the resolution emanates from a distinguished source.

Mr. COX. I propose to object to this because it comes from my own State. This thing ought to be stopped, or the RECORD will be so encumbered that it will be useless.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. COX said: I withdraw my objection to the printing of the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, and reserve it for the next State.

There being no further objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and is as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY,
Albany, January 11, 1876.

Whereas the transportation and business interests of the United States and the commerce of the city and State of New York require the prompt completion of the improvement of the navigation of the Harlem River and Spuyten Duyvil Creek, from the East River, through the Harlem Kills to the Hudson River, pursuant to the surveys and estimates already made under the authority of the United States.

Resolved, (if the senate concurs,) That the Congress of the United States be respectfully requested to make such appropriations as are requisite for the vigorous prosecution and early completion of the improvement of the navigation of the Harlem River and Spuyten Duyvil Creek, from the East River through the Harlem Kills to the Hudson River.

Resolved, (if the senate concurs,) That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Senators and Represenatives in Congress from this State.

By order.

EDWD. M. JOHNSON, Clerk.

In Senate, January 12, 1876.
Passed without amendment.
By order.

H. A. GLIDDEN, Clerk.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SCALES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the resolution which I send to the desk be adopted. I am instructed to offer it by the Committee on Indian Affairs without a dissenting voice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be allowed one clerk, at a compensation of $5 per day.

Mr. HOLMAN. That resolution, I think, should certainly go to the Committee on Accounts.

Several MEMBERS. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SCALES. I offer the resolution by instruction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and insist on my motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The question being taken on the suspension of the rules, there were—ayes 87, noes 26; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER under the rule ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. SCALES.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 121, noes 53.

So the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

INTEREST ON DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BONDS.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the rules be suspended for the passage of a joint resolution directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of the said commissioners, and for other purposes. I offer the joint resolution on behalf of the Committee for the District of Columbia in order to relieve some doubt which the commissioners of the District have as to their power to pay the interest due on the 1st of next month.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) was read. It directs the commissioners of the District of Columbia to transfer to the Treasurer of the United States, for the payment of the interest due the 1st of February, 1876, on the bonds of said District issued under the provisions of the act of Congress, approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia and for other purposes," the sum of $222,797.50 from any unexpended appropriations heretofore made by Congress, or from any revenues derived by taxation on the property of said District of Columbia subject to the requisition of said commissioners; provided that all certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 bonds and those which have not been so converted, and all certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit, or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

Mr. KASSON. Does that take the school fund and authorize the appropriation of it to this purpose? The joint resolution says "any revenues derived by taxation."

Mr. HOAR. I hope the House will permit the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] to make a brief explanation of the resolution. It is very important. Or the gentleman might modify his motion so that the resolution shall be brought before the House for consideration.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I understand that there are now $800,000 in the hands of the commissioners undisposed of, without touching the school fund.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri modify his motion in the way which has been suggested?

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not.

Mr. KASSON. I hope he will be permitted to make an explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the joint resolution be again reported.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the gentleman from Missouri modify his motion so that the rules shall be suspended to bring the resolution before the House for consideration. I do not want to fix the amount at $15,000,000. There are fourteen and a half millions now, and for myself I want to stop there.

Mr. BUCKNER. If the House will give me a few moments I will explain the proposition.

The SPEAKER. What is the motion of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the rules be suspended to allow the joint resolution to be brought before the House for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) so as to bring the joint resolution before the House for consideration.

Mr. BUCKNER. The object of this joint resolution which I have offered is to relieve any doubt in the minds of the commissioners as to their power to use this money. There is no question at all that there is abundant money in their hands, at this time unappropriated to any other specific purpose, to pay this interest; and the only question is whether it shall be paid out of the funds now in their hands, as we say it can be paid without any injury to anybody or violating any specific appropriation that has been made, or whether the Government of the United States shall appropriate a certain sum of money—$220,000—to pay this interest. That is the only question there is in regard to that portion of the joint resolution. There is no doubt that money is in the hands of the commissioners, amounting to at least $800,000, unappropriated, according to their own statement, sufficient to pay this. The question of the school-money is not affected by this proposition at all, because this money that is in their hands is there for general purposes; and it is to relieve a doubt in their minds, inasmuch as it has not been specifically appropriated for the purpose of paying this interest, that this joint resolution is offered, and for no other purpose.

Now as to the question indicated by my friend from Pennsylvania as to the amount of these 3.65 bonds. It is now perhaps within $200,000 of $15,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. The total on Saturday was fourteen and a half millions.

Mr. BUCKNER. That may have been true then, but the amount is increasing, and the object of this resolution is that there shall be a limitation of $15,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to stop it right now. The amount, as I am informed, is $14,209,000, and I do not want to give the commissioners liberty to run the District in debt $800,000 more.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will state to the House what is the amount of bonds issued for the amount of work which has been done in the city since the act authorizing this board of commissioners.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will state that the committee have not gone into that question as yet. We thought it important to limit the amount, so far as we could, for which the United States Government is responsible. If the amount of bonds issued be in excess of the authority conferred on the commissioners and the board of audit, that is a question which the committee will take into consideration hereafter; but in order to make good the pledge of the United States, and that the interest of this debt shall be provided for, either by an appropriation by Congress or by this revenue derived from taxation of the property of the District, it is important that this joint resolution shall be passed now, inasmuch as the 1st of February is rapidly approaching.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to allow the words to be inserted at the proper point, which I think will be before the proviso "excluding the fund raised for the support of the public schools."

Mr. BUCKNER. There cannot be any question on that point whatever.

Mr. KASSON. Then no harm will be done by the amendment. But as it now stands it embraces all the revenues and appropriations of the District.

Mr. BUCKNER. But the appropriations for schools have always been specific for schools, and this appropriation would not touch that at all.

Mr. KASSON. The language of the bill is, "any funds hereafter appropriated."

Mr. BUCKNER. And unexpended.

Mr. KASSON. The word unexpended is not in the bill. If there is a school fund which is not expended I am sure the gentleman does not desire to appropriate it for any purposes but schools, and I ask him to accept the words I have suggested, "excluding the funds raised for the support of the public schools."

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no objection to that at all, but I think it needless.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX.) Does the gentleman from Missouri accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir; I am willing it should be adopted.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I would ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] whether his committee has considered this fact: That if it should be finally determined that under the original act authorizing the issue of these bonds it was confined exclusively to the outstanding obligations of the District by the resolution he now reports to the House, Congress is not committing itself to pay the whole amount it may have incurred in excess of the amount authorized by the original act? For instance, the amount being now $14,210,000, we authorize the payment of interest for an amount in excess of the amount authorized by the original act, and we do not commit ourselves to pay the interest on these bonds to any extent to which they may be issued.

Mr. BUCKNER. I would say to the gentleman that there was no limitation on the amount of these 3.65 bonds in the act passed in 1874. It was stated that at that time it would not exceed $8,400,000. But the committee have not examined into the question, and do not propose to give an opinion here to-day as to what extent the Government of the United States is bound to pay these bonds or what was the amount supposed to be authorized of these bonds. But we say that this joint resolution provides that this interest shall be paid out of the unappropriated balance in the Treasury that the Government has given to the District as well as from the revenues of the District, so that we are not committing ourselves beyond the terms of the act under which the bonds were issued.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will allow me a question. This joint resolution provides for paying the interest on the bonds issued under authority of the act of 1871?

Mr. BUCKNER. No; the act of 1874.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, the gentleman from Missouri will see that if we vote the amount of interest proposed by this resolution we may pay the interest on bonds not authorized to be issued by that act. I therefore ask him to omit his specific sum and insert the words "necessary to pay the same."

Mr. BUCKNER. Well, I do not know that I have any objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then we do not commit ourselves to anything beyond the act of 1874.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. That does not obviate the difficulty.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does in part. I propose that the figures $222,-979.50 shall be stricken out and the words "the sum necessary to pay the same" inserted.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not think that that makes any difference; but to accommodate the gentleman I am willing that the amendment shall be adopted.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to offer a further amendment; and upon that amendment I would like to say a word of explanation.

Mr. BUCKNER. What is the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BUCKNER. I will hear his explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. I reported back a bill last week unanimously from the Committee on Appropriations with a negative recommendation on this subject. In other words, the committee were of the opinion that the District being in funds, being in funds of the United States to the extent of $661,000, from that sum should be paid the interest on these bonds. Now, sir, in a period of eighteen months since this board of commissioners has come into existence and taken control of this District they have involved the people of this District to the extent of $5,203,000; and of that sum for sewerage and for repairs to the extent of $1,100,000, which our committee deemed they had not the shadow of a power for doing. We have therefore deemed it an equitable and reasonable position to compel these gentlemen to pay the interest out of the funds of the District now on hand. Such reckless extravagance I have rarely seen. The public will be given now to understand that the statement which I made a year ago in regard to the amount which the President of the United States was made to say to Congress the debt of the District would be is correct, or rather the amount is more than I declared it to be. The debt of this District to-day is not under $23,000,000, and authority is asked for the issue of 3.65 bonds to the additional amount of more than $700,000 to complete, as is alleged, a particular work on the canal. I do not know whom that is to benefit. It is alleged it is necessary as a sanitary measure. For myself I do not believe any such necessity exists. If this authority is given, I hope the amount will be made to come out of the current funds of the District which they receive from the Government and from the tax-payers, and not be made a permanent debt upon the people who hold property here.

These gentlemen came to me and told me that they needed this appropriation because they had in their treasury but $40,000 toward the payment of this interest. A little investigation disclosed the fact that they desired to retain within their own control the sum of $400,000, so that they might, when the spring opened, go on in their extravagance to that extent in work upon the streets of this District. To my mind it is the plainest requirement of equity, justice, and good conduct on the part of Congress to immediately say to these gentlemen that they shall not impose another dollar of permanent debt upon the people of this District. It is for that purpose, therefore, that I desire to move the amendment I have indicated to make the limitation $14,300,000, and not give these gentlemen the right to go on further to the extent of $700,000, as is proposed by the gentleman Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.] I have understood, however, that his committee were in favor of stopping at this point, and I would like to know what the judgment of his committee is on that subject, whether they are in favor of immediately stopping the power to increase the debt of the District without limit.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to move an amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will hear it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Allow me to remark that when the law was passed which authorized the payment of the debt of the district, authority was given to go on and finish certain improvements. Under that authority a very large amount of indebtedness has been created, and I think the time has come to stop it, and for that purpose I move to amend as follows:

The commissioners of the District shall not be authorized to incur or create any further obligations or liability on the part of the United States than that already incurred by contract or otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. That lets in all contracts.

Mr. HOLMAN. It lets in everything.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would be willing to omit the words "or otherwise."

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman that the very difficulties we have got into here, before this increase beyond $10,000,000, arose from the law in which it is claimed we perhaps gave them some reason to increase the debt by new contracts.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would put a stop now, by any means which could be employed consistently with our obligations and honor, to this matter, and I hope some provision will be put upon this bill to accomplish that result.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. The bill under which they have been acting has precisely that limitation, and yet they have gone on.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would prevent any further contracts being made.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. The other bill has the same provision precisely.

Mr. BUCKNER. I understood from the Committee on Appropriations that they proposed the very provision which I have included, that there should be a limitation of fifteen millions. We have a proposition before the committee for the purpose of examining as to these various additional expenditures and this large increase of the debt. But, not having the opportunity to introduce the subject to the attention of the House and believing it important that this joint resolution should be passed in the interest of the credit of the District, we concluded to bring it in to-day and ask a suspension of the rules for its passage.

Now in reference to the limit of $15,000,000; my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says the limit he proposed a few days ago was $14,200,000. I think from the information I have that the amount of bonds or certificates issued is beyond that limit now; that already an amount in excess is liable to be converted into these bonds so as to make the whole amount not less to-day than $14,700,000.

Mr. HOAR. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the general provision of law applicable to the Secretary of the Treasury and other executive officers, in regard to incurring liabilities and expenditures beyond the amount appropriated, is applicable to these commissioners?

Mr. BUCKNER. I have not examined that question, and do not think it is before the committee.

Mr. HOAR. That provision should be applicable to them.

Mr. BUCKNER. I would say from the investigation we have given——

Mr. HOAR. Allow me a moment further to suggest that it seems to me what is wanted is the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] with the further provision that the law which applies to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the executive head of every other Department, that if they make an expenditure or incur an indebtedness beyond the appropriation authorized by Congress they shall be subject to fine and imprisonment, shall apply to these commissioners. That, I think, would be effective, and it is the only thing that would be.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. This subject is probably one of more magnitude than would appear upon the face of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.] If I understand this question it is this: Congress directed the appointment of these commissioners to supply the place of a government which was thought to be not efficient and not exactly honest. Under the law authority was given to the commissioners to be appointed to issue these bonds for the purpose of paying what was then stated to be the total amount of the outstanding obligations that had been incurred by the preceding government of the District. It was supposed at the time and was distinctly understood by the House that the maximum of the whole obligations would not exceed $10,000,000; and no one I am sure on this side of the House would have voted for the issuing of those bonds if it had been supposed there was to be one single dollar issued in excess of the then outstanding obligations. But the new commissioners appointed under that act have proceeded to issue bonds to an amount several million dollars in excess of the limitation. Now a question has arisen not only as to the interest upon these bonds, but as to the obligation of the Government of the United States to recognize them in any way and as to their legality. This fact has affected the value of the bonds in New York because a cloud has been thrown over the whole of them as to their eventual payment and redemption.

Now, I understand this proposition is to evade a direct appropriation by the Congress of the United States from the public Treasury for the payment of this interest, but to take it out of the funds which have been raised by taxation upon the property of the citizens of the District of Columbia, thus in an indirect manner giving validity and legality in appearance to these bonds themselves. Hence the question may properly be considered by the House whether by this procedure authorizing the payment of the interest on these bonds in excess of the original amount authorized under the act we are not recognizing our obligation hereafter to pay from the public Treasury this interest.

Now, I submit to the consideration of the House whether it is wise for us thus to do indirectly what, if we are authorized and justified in doing it, should be done directly. If this interest is to be paid, if the faith of the Government has been pledged to pay it to the amount contemplated in the original act, is it not proper to make the appropriation directly for that purpose? Are we not by this procedure recognizing an obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to appropriate money for the payment of this interest hereafter not only upon those bonds authorized by law but those which it may be finally determined were not authorized by law?

If I am in error as to the intention of the committee in reporting this joint resolution or in the construction to which to my mind it is liable, I shall be very glad if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] would instruct me.

Mr. BUCKNER. As to the excess of authority which has been complained of here (and I think very justly) by which this debt has been run up three or four million dollars beyond what was originally contemplated by Congress and, as I think, beyond what the law by any fair and proper construction authorized on the part of the commissioners, the committee have that matter under consideration and will at a proper time bring it to the attention of the House. Yet in my judgment that question does not affect the proposition now presented by the committee. The question is simply shall the Government make provision for the payment of this interest out of the funds already in the hands of the District commissioners. Those officers have some doubts whether they can, under existing laws, use this money without the authority of Congress. In the first instance they insisted that Congress should make an appropriation for this purpose directly out of the Treasury. The Committee for the District of Columbia as well as the Committee on Appropriations have declined to recommend such an appropriation, finding that the commissioners have abundant resources in their own hands unappropriated specifically for any other purpose; and hence we propose to require that the interest of these 3.65 bonds, due within a few days and amounting to $227,000, shall be paid out of funds already appropriated by Congress for general purposes and out of funds collected by taxation upon the people of the District.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. That amount is calculated upon all the outstanding bonds?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. But the question is whether Congress has authority to take the money of the citizens of the District and pay illegal obligations with it.

Mr. BUCKNER. That raises a question which I do not propose to discuss now and which is not necessarily involved here, for the reason that this joint resolution proposes that this interest shall be paid out of money already in the Treasury of the United States subject to the demand of the commissioners or money collected from taxation in the District. We are complying exactly with the terms of the law by which the Government pledged its faith to pay the interest on these 3.65 bonds.

Mr. RANDALL. Do the commissioners take the position that they have not authority to pay this interest out of funds now in their hands or under their control?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; they do not take that position, but they doubt their authority.

Mr. RANDALL. I have so often been led into traps in connection with the government of this District that I feel the need of treading very carefully lest I may again be at fault. There seems to me great force in the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] that possibly by the action now proposed giving authority for the payment of this interest out of the funds now in the United States Treasury subject to the control of the commissioners we may measurably involve ourselves in an obligation to pay in future the interest upon the entire amount.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not imagine that under the terms of the resolution which we have reported there will be any estoppel at all in that regard if there be anything in the question itself. The Government having appointed agents who have transcended their authority—who had the right to do certain work, but who have exceeded that authority even if they have issued bonds beyond the amount which they had the right to issue—it is a very doubtful question whether the Government would not be compelled, in order to preserve its good faith and honor, to pay those bonds, although illegally issued. But that is a question I do not desire to commit myself to now.

It will be borne in mind that the bonds have been issued upon work done under the authority of the commissioners by a board utterly outside of the pale of the authority of the commissioners themselves. The board of audit was established by an act of Congress, and it was authorized to issue certificates for certain debts which the sinking-fund commissioners were further authorized to convert into bonds. When the commissioners ordered certain work to be done, the board of audit, under the authority conferred upon it, issued certificates, and the sinking-fund commissioners converted those certificates into bonds. Bonds have been issued to a large extent, and I think in excess of the authority conferred either upon the board of audit or upon the commissioners. Having been issued, however, I take it all we have to do in order to carry out the pledge of the Government is to see that the funds in the Treasury appropriated by the Government to this District or which have been collected by taxation shall go to the payment of this interest. That is all which is asked for in the present bill.

A MEMBER. You do not ask then for any direct appropriation?

Mr. BUCKNER. We do not ask any direct appropriation.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to say a word in explanation of the amendment I have proposed?

Mr. BUCKNER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that his amendment provides for nothing more nor less than what the law as it now stands requires. The difficulty is that this work has been done for which these certificates have been issued. No new contracts are being made. We are told that the work being done is only in execution of old contracts.

Mr. RANDALL. Did they not make new contracts calling them continuations of old contracts?

Mr. BUCKNER. I understand so.

Mr. RANDALL. Were they not continuations of old contracts?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; they were not.

Mr. RANDALL. Were they not taking up one description of pavement and putting down another?

Mr. BUCKNER. That is so.

Mr. RANDALL. What confidence, then, can we have in any such contracts?

Mr. BUCKNER. This whole thing is to be the subject of investigation hereafter, and I hope the question now before the House will not be embarrassed by any such consideration as that which has been suggested. It is my intention to ask in behalf of the Committee for the District of Columbia power to go into and fully examine all these questions.

Mr. RANDALL. That is just what we want.

Mr. BUCKNER. At present I say this act ought to be passed in order to relieve the commissioners from doubt. It is in the interest of law and justice and propriety that they should be given authority, if they do not have it now, to use the money in the Treasury appropriated to the District to pay the interest on these 3.65 bonds.

Mr. RANDALL. I am inclined to think they have that authority now, and I am entirely unwilling to take any step which will increase the obligation on the part of this Government in that direction.

Mr. BUCKNER. This does not increase the obligation of the Government at all.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield to me for a word of explanation.

Mr. BUCKNER. I cannot yield, but ask for a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the last clause of the joint resolution be read.

Mr. BUCKNER. I wish to restrict the issue of these bonds.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the last clause of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the certificates hereafter issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 bonds, and those which have not been so converted, and all certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Instead of that limitation of $15,000,000, I desire to submit this proposition, that no bonds shall be issued unless expressly authorized by the provision of said act. I think words should be used which do not recognize in any form the overissue of bonds under the act of 1871. We could use the other words, "and no further bonds shall be issued under said act." If, however, you adopt the latter language, you seem to recognize the validity of the issue of all bonds up to the present date. If the gentleman from Missouri will allow me, I will move my amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I have already offered an amendment striking out all after the word "provided," in the text of the bill, and inserting in lieu thereof as follows: "And any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited."

Mr. HOLMAN. The only objection to that language is that it seems to recognize the overissue of bonds up to this date.

Mr. BUCKNER. It does not do any such thing, and was not intended to do it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume that is the best form in which it can be put, although I should myself have preferred that language had been used which did not recognize the validity of those issued to this date.

Mr. BUCKNER. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I ask that the joint resolution, as now amended, be again read.

The joint resolution, as amended, was again read.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. BUCKNER. I will hear it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the joint resolution these words:

And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

Mr. BUCKNER. I accept that.

Mr. TUCKER'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether this will take funds raised by taxation for other purposes from this District and appropriate them to this particular purpose?

Mr. BUCKNER. It will not. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution, (H. R. No. 51,) as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

At act (S. No. 204) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1208) to correct a mistake in and amend section 4130 of the Revised Statutes.

ESTATE OF JAY COOKE & CO.

Mr. GLOVER. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following preamble and resolution be adopted:

Whereas the Government of the United States is a creditor of the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., now in bankruptcy by order and decree of the district court of the United States in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, resulting from the improvident deposits made by the Secretary of the Navy of the United States with the London branch of said house of Jay Cooke & Co. of the public moneys; and whereas the matter known as the "real-estate pool" was only partially inquired into by the late Joint Select Committee to inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia, in which Jay Cooke & Co. had a large and valuable interest; and whereas Edwin M. Lewis, trustee of the estate and effects of the said firm of Jay Cooke & Co., has recently made a settlement of the interest of the estate of Jay Cooke & Co. with the associates of said firm of Jay Cooke & Co., to the disadvantage and loss, as it is alleged, of the numerous creditors of said estate, including the Government of the United States; and whereas the courts are now powerless, by reason of said settlement, to afford adequate redress to said creditors:

Resolved, That a special committee of five members of this House, to be selected by the Speaker, be appointed to inquire into the nature and history of said "real-estate pool" and the character of said settlement, with the amount of property involved, in which Jay Cooke & Co. were interested, and the amount paid or to be paid in said settlement, with power to send for persons and papers, and report to this House.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the preamble and resolution were adopted.

ARMY OFFICERS IN WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BANNING. I move that the rules be suspended, and the following resolutions adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House a statement of all pay and allowances of every kind and nature whatever made to officers of the Army stationed or on duty in this city of Washington since the 4th of March, 1869, giving in detail the name and rank of such officers, the duties performed, the length of time each has been stationed or on duty in this city, the annual pay and allowances of rent, fuel, quarters, forage, in value received by each, and the authority of law under which such allowances and pay have been made.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

VICE-CONSULS GENERAL.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 1208) to correct a mistake in and amend section 4130 of the Revised Statutes be taken from the Speaker's table that I may move concurrence in an amendment of the Senate thereto. It is simply an amendment to the title of the bill. There is no change in the bill itself.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

Amend the title so as to read:
An act to amend the Revised Statutes, touching vice-consuls general.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

JOHN B. DAVIS.

Mr. WADDELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back the bill (H. R. No. 1209) for the relief of John B. Davis for mail service from Memphis, Tennessee, to White River, Arkansas, in 1868, 1869, and 1870, and to move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

There was no objection, and the change of reference was ordered.

EFFICIENCY OF THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into any abuses or frauds that may exist in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting any branches of the public service, with a view to ascertain what changes and reformation can be made so as to promote integrity, economy, and efficiency therein. And for the purpose of enabling said committee to fully comprehend the workings of said branches of the public service the investigations of said committee may cover such period in the past as said committee may deem necessary for its own guidance or information, or for the protection of the public interest, in the exposing of frauds or abuses of any kind that may exist in any Department; and said committee are authorized to send for persons and papers, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to the gentleman's resolution, but I do think that something more than that is required in order to give the committee power to comprehend all those things.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. RAINEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas under the seventh section of the act entitled "An act amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, the trustees of said corporation deemed it advisable to close up its business, and for that purpose selected three persons as commissioners, whose selection was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and whereas it is advisable that the committee recently appointed by the House to investigate the affairs of said company should know what progress said commissioners have made in their duties since their last report was submitted: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to obtain from said commissioners and furnish to this House at as early a day as possible a full and complete report of their transactions and the present condition of said company setting forth what progress they have made toward closing up its affairs.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before the motion to adjourn is put, the Chair desires to appoint the following additional members on the Committee on Expenditures of the Department of Justice, namely: Mr. MILTON J. DURHAM, of Kentucky; Mr. ALEXANDER G. COCHRANE, of Pennsylvania; Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON, of Ohio; and Mr. OMAR D. CONGER, of Michigan.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal of papers in the following cases.

By Mr. BAKER, of Indiana: The papers in the case of A. M. Vinnedge, no adverse report having been made.

By Mr. GUNTER: The papers in the case of Alfred T. Couden, no adverse report having been made.

By Mr. GAUSE: The papers in the case of William F. Grove, no adverse report having been made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PACKER for four days.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] to withdraw the motion to adjourn, for a moment, that I may move a suspension of the rules, to offer the following resolution which I hold in my hand. [Cries of "Regular order!"] This is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdrew it that I might offer this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. EDEN. Yes, sir; I withdrew it.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, then submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is alleged that improper and fraudulent means were resorted to to influence legislation in the passage of the act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, by persons interested in the passage of said act, and that contracts and combinations were subsequently entered into by said company, in violation of the terms of said act: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into said allegations and report to the House whether improper and fraudulent means were resorted to in securing the passage of said act, and whether the said company has by its contracts and combinations with other companies done any other act which would justify the forfeiture of the franchises granted by said act, and to this end said committee may send for persons and papers.

And then, on motion of Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Jeremiah Darling, for pay for carrying the United States mail over route No. 9497, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BELL: The petition of Daniel Webster, for an appropriation for a trial of his moth-extinguisher, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. BOONE: The petition of John R. Puryear and 662 citizens of Kentucky, for the erection of a court-room and other public buildings at Paducah, Kentucky, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BRADFORD: The petition of citizens of Clay County, Alabama, for a post-route from Good Water to Coleta, Alabama, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BUCKNER: A paper to make the road from Troy to New Hope, Missouri, a post-road, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of John G. Copelin, for damages on account of seizure of the steamer U. S. Grant by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a memorial, for the improvement of the harbor of Washington, District of Columbia, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: The petition of Sarah Whitaker, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama: The petitions of Dempsey David, Edward P. Durando, William Graham, Precilla Graham, Elizabeth Kiker, John Kackleman, John Lawler, James A. Meals, Isaac N. Owen, Mary Ellen Saffold, Riley Sparks, Clark M. Tompkins, and Thomas J. Wales, for a rehearing of their claims for property taken and used by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of Charles H. Foudé, for an extension of letters-patent, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. CATE: A paper relating to a post-route from Shiloh to Balsam Lake, Wisconsin, to the Committee on the Post-office and Post-roads.

By Mr. CAULFIELD: The petition of citizens of Cook, Will, and Kankakee Counties, Illinois, for the improvement of the Calumet River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. COCHRANE: The petition of citizens of Allegheny and other counties of Pennsylvania, for authority to close the channel of the Ohio River on the south side of Neville Island by the erection of an embankment or causeway from the head of said island to the southern shore of said river, to the same committee.

By Mr. CRAPO: A paper relating to a post-route from South Hanson to Pembroke Centre, in Plymouth County, Massachusetts, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CULBERSON: A paper relating to a post-route from Honey Grove, in Fannin County, to Sulphur Springs, in Hopkins County, Texas, to the same committee.

By Mr. DUNNELL: The petition of C. P. Chase, for an amendment of the act relating to the planting of timber on prairie lands, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DOBBINS: The petition of citizens of Burlington, New Jersey, for an appropriation for deepening the channel of the Delaware River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DAVY: The petition of James B. Hanrey, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Dennis B. Willard, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Also, papers in the case of Nancy A. Herrick, of Rochester, New York, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

By Mr. EDEN: The petition of Samuel M. Nally, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. EGBERT: The petition of 66 citizens of Rouseville, Venango County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the specie-resumption act of June 14, 1875, and for other purposes, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 25, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a memorial of women-citizens of this nation, asking for the establishment of a government in the District of Columbia which shall secure to its women-citizens the right to vote. This petition is signed by many eminent ladies of the country; by Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage, president of the National Women's Suffrage Association, and the following officers of that society: Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Henrietta Payne Westbrook, Isabella Beecher Hooker, Mathilde F. Wendt, E. C. Sargent; also by Mary F. Foster, president of the District of Columbia Women's Suffrage Association; Susan A. Edson, M. D.; Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, the distinguished authoress; Mrs. Dr. Caroline B. Winslow; Belva A. Lockwood, practicing law in this District; Susan J. Spencer, and Mrs. A. E. Wood. These intelligent ladies set forth their petition in language and with facts and arguments which I think should meet the ear of the Senate, and I ask that it be read by the Secretary in order that their desires may be known.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will report the petition.

The Secretary read as follows:

Memorial of women-citizens of this nation.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has re-affirmed the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia in the cases of Spencer vs. The Board of Registration and Webster vs. The Judges of Election, and has decided that "by the operation of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States women have been advanced to full citizenship and clothed with the capacity to become voters, and further, that this first section of the fourteenth amendment does not execute itself, but requires the supervention of legislative power in the exercise of legislative discretion to give it effect;" and whereas the Congress of the United States is the legislative body having exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, and in enfranchising the colored man and refusing to enfranchise any woman, white or colored, made an unjust discrimination against sex, and did not give the intelligence and moral power of the citizens of said District a fair opportunity for expression at the polls; and whereas woman suffrage is not an experiment, but has had a fair trial in Wyoming, where women hold office, where they vote, where they have the most orderly society of any of the Territories, where the experiment is approved by the executive officers of the United States, by their courts, by their press, and by the people generally, and where it has "rescued that Territory from a state of comparative lawlessness" and rendered it "one of the most orderly in the Union;" and whereas upon the woman-suffrage amendment to Senate bill No. 44 of the second session of the Forty-third Congress votes were recorded in favor of woman suffrage by the two Senators from Indiana, the two from Florida, the two from Michigan, the two from Rhode Island, one from California, one from Kansas, one from Louisiana, one from Massachusetts, one from Minnesota, one from Nebraska, one from Nevada, one from Oregon, one from South Carolina, one from Texas, and one from Wisconsin; and whereas a fair trial of equal suffrage for men and women in the District of Columbia, under the immediate supervision of Congress, would demonstrate to the people of the whole country that justice to women is policy for men; and whereas the women-citizens of the United States are governed without their own consent, are denied trial by a jury of their peers, are taxed without representation, and are subject to manifold wrongs, resulting from unjust and arbitrary exercise of power over an unrepresented class; and whereas in this centennial year of the Republic the spirit of 1776 is breathing its influence upon the people, melting away prejudices and animosities and infusing into our national councils a finer sense of justice and a clearer perception of individual rights: Therefore,

We pray your honorable body to establish a government for the District of Columbia which shall secure to its women-citizens the right to vote.

Mr. SARGENT. Even if this document were not accompanied by the signatures of eminent ladies known throughout the land for their virtues, intelligence, and high character, the considerations which it presents would be worthy of the attention of the Senate. I have no doubt that the great movement of which this is a part will prevail. It is working its progress day by day throughout the country. It is making itself felt both in social and political life. The petitioners here well say that there has been a successful experiment of the exercise of female suffrage in one of our Territories; that a Territory has been redeemed from lawlessness to subjection to law; that the judges, the press, the people generally of Wyoming approve the results of this great experiment. I know of no better place than the capital of the nation where a more decisive trial can be made if such is needed to establish the expediency of woman suffrage. As to its justice, who shall deny it if woman demands it? I ask, for the purpose of due consideration, that this petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, so that in preparing any scheme for the government of the District which is likely to come before this Congress due weight may be given to the considerations presented in this petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of John S. Logan, praying to be re-imbursed in the sum of $1,000 for moneys advanced by him at the beginning of the late war to purchase supplies for the use of United States troops; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the memorial of Margaret L. Stevens, widow of the late General Isaac I. Stevens, praying that in the settlement of her late husband's accounts as superintendent of Indian affairs of Washington Territory allowance may be made for certain payments made by him, and for the payment also for certain important and extraordinary services rendered by him; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Grange No. 1 of New Jersey, asking the repeal of the law of Congress increasing the postage on third-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Messrs. Cole, Seizer, and Brink, praying compensation for the failure of the War Department to carry out a contract with them for the sale of certain property near Augusta, Georgia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of Wisconsin, praying that an amendment to the Constitution of the United States be laid before the people of the United States. I quote from the petition: "that the Senate (a mere copy of the aristocratic House of Lords in England and other monarchies) be abolished and its privileges and duties, so far as they do not become superfluous, be transferred to the House of Representatives." I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON presented the petition of Alexander C. Crawford, of Galveston, Texas, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of his property by United States forces during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARVEY presented the petition of H. E. Van Deman and others, praying for a modification of the postal laws and a reduction of the rates of postage on third-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WALLACE presented two petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, praying for aid in the construction and completion of the Texas Pacific Railway and in aid of the prostrated iron industries of Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the petition of Christopher White, of Savannah, Georgia, praying compensation for a quantity of tobacco taken from him and used by the United States authorities in 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORDON presented the petition of Samuel Crown, of the District of Columbia, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of his land in that District and the destruction of his property connected with the same by United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1052) to correct an error in the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the Army Register for 1876 be printed for the use of the Senate.

NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the Navy Register for 1876 be printed for the use of the Senate.

HEIRS OF JAMES SINCLAIR.

Mr. KELLY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 225) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased, to report it back with an amendment. It is a short bill, and I would like to have it put on its passage at once, for the reason that it passed at the last Congress just as it is now reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks the present consideration of the bill which he has reported. Is there objection?

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear it read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported.

The bill was read.

No objection being made, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator from Oregon would tell us in general terms what this is.

Mr. KELLY. James Sinclair was a native of Rupert's Land, British America, born in the year 1811, and married in April, 1848. He emigrated to the United States, having declared his intention to become a citizen in Saint Paul, Minnesota, in 1849. He settled upon this tract of land and filed his notification November 30, 1855, claiming six hundred and forty acres of land under what is known as the "donation law" of Oregon, which granted six hundred and forty acres to every white man settling thereon who was a married a man or who became married on or before December 1, 1851. This gentleman commenced his residence upon that tract of land, built a house, took his family there, and was residing on it when the Indian war broke out in 1855. Nathan Olney, the Indian agent of the United States, removed all the settlers from Walla Walla Valley so that they should not be in danger from Indian hostilities. So hurried was the flight of the settlers that all the cattle, some six hundred, that this gentleman had remained there, and a number of horses, and they were all taken by the Indians. The house was destroyed. Mr. Sinclair made an effort to return there, was on his way from the Willamette Valley, in Oregon, when he was killed, on the 29th day of March, 1856, leaving this widow and three little helpless children. Soon afterward, in the year following, this land was taken by the United States military forces as a timber reservation to supply the fort at Walla Walla, some five miles distant; the timber was all taken off it; but February 24, 1871, it was restored by act of Congress to the public domain, or rather transferred to the Secretary of the Interior to be sold. Mrs. Sinclair then applied again to the Land Office to have her rights protected, but inasmuch as the land was ordered to be sold, the Land Office could do nothing in the premises.

Now let me state the right of Mrs. Sinclair. The eighth section of the donation land law of Oregon provides as follows:

> That upon the death of any settler before the expiration of the four years' continued possession required by this act, all the rights of the deceased under this act shall descend to the heirs at law of such settler, including the widow, where one is left, in equal parts; and proof of the compliance with the conditions of this act up to the time of the death of such settler shall be sufficient to entitle them to the patent.

Her husband did file his notification; he complied with all the provisions of the law, so far as settlement upon the land was concerned. He remained there; that was his home up to the time of his death. I have here a copy of the notification and proofs filed in the proper land office of Washington Territory, showing an entire compliance with all the provisions of the law up to the time of his death; and I suppose there can be no particle of doubt that the heirs are entitled to this land in law as well as in equity. The only reason why they have not applied heretofore to obtain possession is that it was in the control of the military authorities from the latter part of 1856 or 1857 until 1871. As soon as the widow could make application, she did so to the proper land office. I may say in this connection that this gentleman who was so unfortunately killed was one of the very wealthy men at that time in Oregon. His property was wholly lost, his cattle taken, his horses also, and everything lost, the property stripped of its timber, and Mrs. Sinclair is now a helpless and a needy woman. This is nothing but an act of justice to restore to her that which the law has already really given, or at least to give her title to the land.

Mr. WRIGHT. I doubt not the case is all right, but I wish to ask the colleague of the Senator from Oregon——

Mr. KELLY. I cannot hear the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was addressing a remark to the Senator's colleague, who will remember that there was a claim before the Committee on Claims touching compensation for some land that had been lost under circumstances very similar to these. I am not certain that this is the same name or the same claim.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think that was not this case.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is a different case?

Mr. MITCHELL. That was the case of Mr. Schwatka.

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe that was the name of the claimant. I remember some of the circumstances of that case, for upon examining it I was impressed that the claim was not well founded; but this seems to be a different case.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is an entirely different case. The Senator has reference to the case of Mr. Schwatka.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment. The amendment was in lines 11 and 16 to strike out the word "children" and insert the word "heirs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the bill be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims, with the papers in the case already on file.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 334) to establish an educational fund and apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to public education and to provide for the more complete endowment and support of national colleges for the advancement of scientific and industrial education; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 335) authorizing a settlement of the claim of the estate of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Dahlgren; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say in this connection that there has been no adverse report in that case; on the contrary, there has been one, if not two, favorable reports—one in the Senate and one in the House; and a bill, a precise copy of this, was passed at the last session of Congress by the Senate, but it did not reach the House in time for action there. There are papers on file in connection with the case, and I ask that they be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and having received favorable action heretofore in the Senate as well as in the House, I hope the committee will give it early attention.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 336) to authorize the construction of a ponton-bridge across the Mississippi River from some feasible point in La Crosse County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Houston County, in the State of Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 337) for the relief of Fannie A. Thompson, administratrix de bonis non of Brigadier-General William Thompson, of the revolutionary army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 338) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of the Pottawatomie Indians; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 339) to amend section 2568 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to make Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, a port of delivery; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 340) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain officers of the Navy who were dropped, furloughed, or retired under the act of February 28, 1865," approved January 30, 1875; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 341) for the relief of John Wightman, a contractor for carrying the mail in Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers in the case already on file, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 342) to amend section 5007 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 343) restoring to the pension-rolls the name of James Buchanan; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 344) for the relief of W. S. McComb, of the State of Georgia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 345) for the relief of Reuben Wright, a licensed trader in the Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MILITIA OF THE STATES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the aggregate number of the organized militia of the several States, respectively.

DISTRICT RAILROADS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire and report whether the existing railroads running into the District of Columbia impede and obstruct unnecessarily the avenues, and streets, and public grounds in the city of Washington; and whether said railroads have acquired the right to use and occupy said streets, avenues, and public grounds, and the extent of their rights, and what measures are expedient to secure the surrender of such rights of occupancy as are injurious to the public, and upon what terms such surrender can be had, and as to the expediency of a change of the location of the depots of the said railroads.

CHANGE OF CONSULATES.

Mr. CONKLING. If there be no further morning business, I move that the Senate take up the bill (S. No. 305) to change the location of the consulates at Aix-la-Chapelle, and at Omoa, and Truxillo.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the consulate now established at Aix-la-Chapelle, in class 5, in schedule B of consulates, be removed to Cologne, within the same consular district; and the consulate now established at Omoa and Truxillo, in class 7, in schedule C of consulates, be removed to Utila, in the Bay Islands; and that such removals shall in no manner affect the appropriations for such consulates or the existing provisions of law applicable thereto, except as modified hereby.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I ought to say that this bill is reported by the Committee on Commerce, at the suggestion of the Department of State, which Department has sent to the committee statements that I have here of some length, which can be read, of course, if any Senator wishes to hear them. Perhaps, however, I shall dispose of the matter sufficiently when I say that the bill involves no increase of appropriation or expense, and has no effect whatever, except to authorize the change of location of the consulates named, and for that change there seem to be abundant reasons assigned of convenience, economy and expedition in the dispatch of business.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there be no objection, I would ask the present consideration of a bill that was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs yesterday. The bill is to vacate a certain military road from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon, and to relinquish it to the counties through which it runs.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 252) donating the military road running from Astoria, Oregon, to Salem, in that State, to the several counties through which it passes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It seems to me there ought to be some explanation as to the extent of this donation and what is involved in it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state, in connection with the bill, that this road was surveyed and constructed under acts of Congress passed in 1855, 1857, and 1858 by the Secretary of War as a military road. It has been abandoned by the military authorities entirely. General Humphreys reports that it is no longer necessary for military purposes; the Adjutant-General reports that it is no longer necessary for military purposes; the Secretary of War also reports that it is no longer necessary for military purposes. The governor of Oregon and the Secretary of War both ask that this road may be abandoned to the counties through which it runs, to be hereafter used and kept up by them as a public highway, the Government incurring no liability at all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What does it donate? Simply the road-bed?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The right of way and the road-bed?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir. Some of the citizens are fencing and causing inconvenience, and it is a question as to who has jurisdiction to cause it to be kept open: whether the United States must keep it open, or whether the counties through which it runs should keep it open.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The object is to abandon the road?

Mr. COCKRELL. The object is to donate it to the counties through which it runs, and let them have the control of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And keep it open?

Mr. COCKRELL. If they so desire.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It seems to me that the bill does not accomplish that precisely.

Mr. COCKRELL. It donates it to them, and they can do as they please with it hereafter.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, I will say a word or two in favor of this bill. This bill does not come from either of the Senators from Oregon, although we both approve it. It was at the recommendation of the Secretary of War that a bill of this kind was introduced. The reason for it is this: this military road was constructed, at a great expense to the Government, while Oregon was a Territory, and mainly through a timber region. It has been but little traveled. The road is, I suppose, about one hundred miles in length, more or less; I do not know the exact extent. Timber has fallen across the road, and in a great measure it has become impassable. There was an effort made to get the United States to appropriate money to keep it up, but with no success. Now some persons are inclosing portions of it in their fields, and the question arises whether the United States should keep it open and prevent its being closed up by settlers or whether the State should do it; and to prevent this conflict of jurisdiction, it is deemed best by the military authorities to abandon the road, so far as the United States is concerned, and have it transferred to the State, or rather to the counties through which the road passes. If they choose to keep it open as a public highway, very well. At all events, this bill is simply to relieve the United States from any further expense in the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state, in addition to what my colleague has said, that the road is of no manner of use to the Government; that there are no Government supplies of any kind transported over it, and have not been for years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to know whether there is anything about this excepting the simple road-bed, and whether the act gives any right to any adjoining land-owner, or anything of that kind.

Mr. MITCHELL. Nothing at all. There is nothing whatever but the abandonment of the road-bed by the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the time, and passed.

JOINT RULES OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a resolution offered by me on January 21, which was laid over on the application of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] relating to the submission of matters embraced by the twenty-second joint rule of the last Congress to the Committees of the House and Senate on Rules.

Mr. HAMLIN. I concur with the Senator from Delaware that it is wise and well to settle this matter; but I think we had better dispose of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] as the first in order. I think the more appropriate way would be to settle the question which arises under the resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont, and which has been under discussion by the Senate one or two days briefly.

Mr. BAYARD. If the honorable Senator from Maine will allow the resolution to come up and have it read, it seems to me it will commend itself to his favorable consideration.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Delaware that the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who first introduced this subject and who is interested in it, is not present to-day and probably will not be to-morrow. Perhaps it would be agreeable to him to let it lie over until that Senator's return.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator from New Jersey thinks that Senator would be likely to discuss it I should be glad to have him present; but if I remember the course he took in the debate on this subject he intimated his approval of the resolution as a separate matter, although he did not like it as an amendment to the report of the Committee on Rules.

I will merely say that there is no time more favorable for the discussion of this rule than the present. There has been no time for the last twelve years when the discussion of the subjects embraced by the twenty-second joint rule could be more favorably had than the present. There are few subjects of more critical interest to be settled rightfully than the matters embraced by that rule, and I think the sooner we bring it to the calm consideration of the Committees on Rules of the two Houses the better for us all and the better for the country. The longer this is delayed the nearer we drift to one of those periodical contests under our form of government; and the sooner we settle in a calm high spirit these questions which may involve great differences of opinion and interest, the better for us all.

In view of the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey, I shall not press the consideration of this resolution in the absence of the Senator from Vermont, although my impression is quite distinct that the Senator from Vermont concurred in the resolution as I presented it. The Senator from New York asked that it might lie over, and it was at his request continued. I meant to bring it up, and I shall bring it up again when it is the pleasure of the Senate to consider it. I think it important that it should be settled as speedily as possible, if it can be. If the two Houses can be brought to agreement on this subject with the present condition of party matters between the two Houses, I think it will be a guarantee that the result will be satisfactory to the people of the country. Not only is it important to us that the election should take place with all proper guards, but the great matter is that after it is over all the people should come together as one people to support whoever may be the persons chosen by the majority.

Mr. HAMLIN. I concur in every word the Senator from Delaware has uttered in relation to this rule, and that it is highly proper and expedient that we come to a right and proper understanding at as early a period of time as possible. The Senator will recollect that I urged it upon the attention of the Senate a few days since, and gave notice that I should continue to urge it until it should have received the action and judgment of the Senate. While it is undoubtedly true that the Senator from Vermont concurs in any proper mode of settling this matter, and as the Senator from Delaware tells us specifically in the resolution which he has offered, yet I do equally well know that the Senator from Vermont believes that action should first be had upon the resolution which he introduced, and which has been reported from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator from Maine that that resolution was passed as amended on my motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I have not a word of objection to the proposition submitted by the Senator from Delaware. I wish to say to the Senator from New Jersey that the resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont having been passed and gone to the other branch, I do not see any necessity for delay in the resolution which has been submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I trust it will be taken up.

Mr. HAMLIN. I had a conference with the Senator from Vermont, and I did understand him to say that until the Senate acted upon the resolution which he himself had introduced he thought it important not to consider this, as that should have the precedence.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I think another thing about this matter has escaped his observation. After the adoption of the resolution which came from the Committee on Rules, the Senator from Delaware proposed at once to take up the resolution he now refers to. I suggested, and, although I do not wish to speak of other Senators absent or present, it was the judgment, I think, of the Senators around me, that, having adopted the other resolution establishing, so far as we can do so, all the joint rules except one, it would be better to allow the House of Representatives to suppose that that was what we meant, as we did mean it for the present, and have the joint rules, save that one, put into operation in order that we might have joint rules during the time that we are considering the general question proposed by the Senator from Delaware. I suggested then, and I now suggest, and I think it was at that time the judgment of the Senate, that if, before the other House acts upon that resolution, we send over another proposition to refer all these rules that have been adopted to a concurrent committee to consider, it is very likely that that will have the effect to delay, if not to prevent, in that House action upon the resolution which we have already adopted.

Now I submit to the Senate and to the Senator from Maine that the same reason which led Senators to object to considering the resolution now proposed at that time, still prevails perhaps in a somewhat diminished degree; but the substance of that objection was that the two Houses ought to come together if they could upon all these rules as to which there was no objection, those being literally all the joint rules except the twenty-second, and we having so concurred and having the rules for our government in the meantime, there would be no objection to referring, as the Senator from Delaware proposes to refer, to both the Committees on Rules of the two Houses the whole question of the joint rules, because then, no matter how long they might fail to agree, no matter what might be the protracted consideration they would give, no matter if ultimately they failed to agree altogether, we should have a rule on every subject pertaining to joint rules except the one covered by this very important rule numbered 22; whereas if we now adopt this resolution and send it over before action has been taken upon the other, and the House takes that as notice that we want to treat with regard to all these rules, in the mean time we have no joint rules on any subject.

I submit therefore to the Senator from Delaware that it would be more economical of time and more orderly in the natural disposition of business, to establish for the time being the joint rules upon which there is no disagreement, and then refer the whole subject, if he pleases, under his resolution, to the two committees or to any committee to see what they can suggest.

And as I have risen, Mr. President, with a suggestion somewhat in the nature of an objection, I beg if for no purpose except to guard against a misunderstanding, to say, as I have had occasion to say in the Senate before, that nobody is more thoroughly convinced than I am of the impropriety of the twenty-second joint rule, of the peril of that rule, of the objections to it. Again, nobody is more conscious than I am that there should be, if there can be, a mode invented of verifying, establishing, and declaring certainly the voice of the people as that voice shall be uttered at the ballot-box in the next and every succeeding presidential election. The subject is important, it is urgent. Any plan of arriving at a true solution of it shall have my vote always. At this moment, however, I suggest that we shall make haste more certainly, and I think more rapidly, if we allow the two Houses to consent to all the joint rules as to which there is no conflict of opinion, and then proceed to deal with this one joint rule, with power, if you please, as given in this resolution, to take up any others also, but, in the meantime, having rules for our government, and agreeing as far forth as we can touching matters in respect of which I know of no conflict of opinion in the Senate, or between the two Houses. Therefore, if the Senator from Delaware will allow his resolution to stand, perhaps for only a day or two—because I imagine there will be no want of disposition in the other House to act upon the resolution we sent them the other day—let that resolution become effective, as it is not now effective at all, and then move to take up this resolution, and I think I shall look in vain for opposition anywhere in the Senate; certainly he will find none from me.

Mr. BAYARD. I believe the effect upon the other House would be a very good one if this measure should go to them by the unanimous voice of the Senate. I do not wish, in regard to this resolution, that there shall be any difference of opinion or any clash of opinion at all. It seems to me that it is a subject in which we all have a common interest, a subject in which we are all agreed; and, therefore, having been penetrated very thoroughly by a belief in the immediate importance of the settlement of this question, if settlement there can be had, I have thought it right to bring the question before the Senate first a few days ago, and again now, and I shall again present it when in their good pleasure they shall be willing to act upon it. And if by the withdrawal of my own opinions at the time I can secure a unanimity of expression of opinion of this body, showing that we act as a Senate, and not in any way as partisans, I think some good may be achieved. Therefore I shall not now raise any objection to the postponement of this question until a time when the Senate will more unanimously consider the matter.

The object of the resolution is not to touch the question of the joint rules generally, because I think the two Houses are reasonably satisfied with the joint rules as they stand. I have no idea that any amendments will be proposed. There was an interesting question, raised for the first time so far as I know in the history of this country, that either House could at will retire from a joint rule. That is a very serious and interesting question. I am inclined to think the power does exist, and that power having been conceded to exist by the action of the Senate it then becomes very important that the subject embraced by the late twenty-second joint rule should be considered by law and placed in the shape of law, so that it may not be revocable at the will of either House or of any accidental majority.

As I said before, I shall not press the matter now. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senate and the country upon getting clear of the twenty-second joint rule. If it was adopted by assent, that assent has been withdrawn. It is no longer a rule of the two Houses. I undertook some two years ago to present to the Senate and the country the dangers of that rule, and I have done so, I believe, at every succeeding session. But I want to call the attention of the Senate to one fact in connection with the proposition made by the Senator from Delaware, that is, to refer the consideration of this question to the Committees on Rules of the two Houses. Last session I introduced a concurrent resolution to amend and change the twenty-second joint rule, providing among other things that no electoral vote should be rejected without the concurrent vote of both Houses, providing the method by rule of counting the votes for President and Vice-President. When that was presented there were suggestions on the part of Senators on both sides of the Chamber that that ought not to be in the form of a rule, but ought to be a law, and at that suggestion I withdrew the resolution, and afterward reported a bill to provide for the counting of the votes, and it passed this body after a very lengthy and interesting debate; and I would say now that I think if there is a rule on the subject it ought to be in the form of a law. I do not believe it is in the power of the two Houses by a simple joint rule to reject the vote of a State either by the vote of one House or by the vote of both Houses. Whether we have the power to reject the electoral vote of a State may be a doubtful question; but that we can do it by simple joint rule and disfranchise the State of New York with four or five millions of people, I do not believe for a single moment. If there is to be a rule upon that subject it ought to be in the form of a law well considered. Having that in view I introduced a bill at this session, which is now pending before the Committe on Privileges and Elections, to provide a method for counting the vote and determining the question as to contested votes. The resolution of the Senator from Delaware looks to the withdrawal of that question from that committee and its submission to the committees of the two Houses on the subject of rules. I should so regard it if this resolution should pass the Senate. I believe that, under any circumstances, and I rather think I had the concurrence of the Senator from Delaware himself at the last session, whatever is done on the subject should be in the form of a law. It is too big a subject to handle by a mere joint rule.

Mr. BAYARD. I agree to that; and I had not the slightest idea of invading the Senator's jurisdiction or that of his committee.

Mr. MORTON. I do not care about the invasion.

Mr. BAYARD. It is impossible for me to know what measures may be before the Senator's committee; nor do I believe his labors, intelligent as we know they are, will be at all thrown away on the other committees of the body. I certainly do not desire to withdraw the subject from his jurisdiction in any way, and I do not desire to impair at all the value of his labors; nor does it seem to me that they would be impaired by the course I have proposed. I think, indeed, that this question can be taken up by the committees of the two Houses on Rules and considered by them together, and, perhaps by the light of the suggestions of the honorable Senator himself, and the measures which he is now maturing in his Committee on Privileges and Elections, there will be a better chance to come to a common understanding. Everybody must feel that it is very important that we should come to an understanding. Everybody must feel that it is important to every man in this country that there should be between the two Houses, as they stand now, a common ground of agreement, and if an agreement is reached, it will be satisfactory, because the two great political parties will feel that they are mutually represented in each House.

I did not consider the fact, indeed I did not know the fact, that the Senator had the subject under his consideration in committee. There was no means of my knowing it, and I beg him to believe that my resolution was not in any degree designed to subtract from his jurisdiction. However, I have consented to let the matter go over at the suggestion of several Senators on the other side, and I do not regret the discussion it has caused. The subject is important, and one that ought to be finally decided.

Mr. MORTON. One word. I do not wish to be misunderstood about this matter. There is no question of etiquette or courtesy about it. If it is the desire of the Senate to refer the question to the Committees on Rules I have no sort of objection; and the fact that a bill has been introduced and that the question is now pending before another committee should make no kind of difference. I simply say that if the question be so referred, of course we cannot help but understand that it is the desire of the Senate to have it considered by the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Privileges and Elections would not feel under obligation to proceed with the consideration of the question. I believe the Senator from Delaware will not dissent from the opinion I stated—I think he did not at the last session—that whatever is done on the subject should be in the form of a law, and that we cannot act upon it properly in the form simply of a joint rule. No graver question was ever presented to Congress than the question of depriving States of their votes in the election of President and Vice-President.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1558) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1561) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasurer of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CONOVER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of James A. Harrold be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CRAGIN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector United States Navy, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CRAGIN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of John W. January be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. HARVEY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 34.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The unfinished business is Senate bill No. 124.

Mr. HARVEY. Inasmuch as the expiration of the morning hour gives the unfinished business of yesterday precedence, I now ask the consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 34 after the pending bill shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather take the vote on the pending bill, and then I will join the Senator from Kansas with great pleasure in taking up his bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the unfinished business is insisted on.

The consideration of the bill (S. No. 124) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of five persons, neither of whom shall be the holder of any office of profit or trust in the General or a State Government, and all of whom shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or total abstinence in relation to alcoholic or fermented liquors. The said commissioners shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed one year. It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic and manufacture, having special reference to revenue and taxation, distinguishing as far as possible, in the conclusions they arrive at, between the effects produced by the use of distilled or spirituous liquors and the use of fermented or malt liquors, in their economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects, in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States, and the effect produced by such legislation upon the consumption of distilled or spirituous liquors and fermented or malt liquors; also to ascertain whether the evils of drunkenness have been increased or decreased, and whether public morals have been improved thereby. It shall also be the duty of said commissioners to gather information and take testimony as to whether the evil of drunkenness exists to the same extent, or more so, in other civilized countries, and whether those foreign nations that are considered the most temperate in the use of stimulants are so through prohibitory laws; and also to what degree prohibitory legislation has affected the consumption and manufacture of malt and spirituous liquors in this country.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall serve without salary, shall be authorized to employ a secretary at a reasonable compensation, not to exceed $2,000 per annum, which, with the necessary expenses incidental to said investigation, in all not exceeding $10,000, of both the secretary and commissioners, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon vouchers to be approved by the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury. It shall be the further duty of said commissioners to report the result of their investigation and the expenses attending the same to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I move to amend the bill by inserting in section 1——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will observe to the Senator from Michigan that the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having agreed to the amendment reported as a substitute, it will not be in order to amend that amendment by insertion until the bill shall have been reported to the Senate. On the question of concurring in the Senate in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, it will be open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "that," in the first line of the first section, the following words:

For the purpose of obtaining information which may serve as a guide to the system of legislation best fitted for the District of Columbia, the several Territories of the United States, and other places subject to the legislation of Congress in reference to the question of revenue from the manufacture and sale of alcoholic and fermented liquors, and the effect of the use of such liquors upon the morals and welfare of the people of such District, Territories, and places.

And then follow the words of the bill, "there shall be appointed," &c.

Mr. President, I have but a few words to say on this amendment. This is a bill for instituting an inquiry and obtaining information with reference to legislation to be adopted hereafter, and in consequence of this inquiry. So far, therefore, as it may bear upon legislation where Congress has a right to legislate, the inquiry is pertinent and legitimate; so far as it might bear upon the question of the proper legislation elsewhere, it is wholly illegitimate. Congress has the power to legislate in the District of Columbia and in the several Territories; and so far as the inquiry relates to the national revenue the inquiry is legitimate, without geographical limits.

But few I think would claim that Congress has any right to assume a guardianship over the morals of the people in the States or to determine for them the question of prohibition or license. For one I deny the existence of any such power. And yet as this bill now stands it is open to the inference that it claims for Congress the control over the whole subject throughout the entire Union. Under a system like ours, where the powers are partitioned between the General and the State Governments, I think it important not only that the one should not exercise powers belonging wholly to the other, but that they should not even appear to claim such powers. The harmony of the system requires that neither should appear to claim what clearly belongs to the other. For these reasons I cannot vote for this bill as it now stands, and to avoid this objection I have offered this amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not think that this amendment ought to prevail. I suppose no one will dispute that we have the right to get information on any subject. I suppose that we may legislate on any subject which we are authorized to legislate upon by the Constitution. Now, this information that we want is certainly legitimate for legislation in the District of Columbia; it is certainly legitimate for the purpose of legislating for the Territories; and it is equally clear that it is legitimate for the purpose of legislating as to the States—not in legislating as to the States, to impose penalties or municipal regulations. But it may be that the disclosures made by this information will prove that we ought to impose much higher duties on the importation of liquors; it may show that we ought to impose a much higher tax on whisky produced at home, which affects all the States as well as the Territories. I do not think it is necessary that we, in passing a law to obtain information, should advertise to the country that we are afraid that when we get this information we may use it for some unconstitutional purpose.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Senator from New Jersey will permit me to state that this amendment does not limit the inquiry.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that the amendment of my friend does not limit the inquiry at all; but it does in advance prescribe what use we shall make of the information when we get it, as if we distrusted ourselves that when we got the information we should go into a business which we have never assumed, that of passing penal statutes affecting the States. We want the information for the States for the reason I have stated. We may want to impose a higher tax upon whisky manufactured in the States, or a higher duty upon liquor imported into the States, or a lower tax——

Mr. HAMLIN. And so as to their quality.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We may also wish to legislate as to the quality. I think we can trust ourselves not to abuse this information when we shall have obtained it.

Mr. HOWE. I want to make a single suggestion to the honorable Senator from Michigan. He has rightly said that his amendment does not restrict the scope of the inquiry at all. I think he would say, if asked, that the only purpose or effect of his amendment was to show on the face of the bill the reasons why we have jurisdiction to make the inquiry. Now, does he think that at all essential? He has presided over judicial trials and inquiries for a great many years. I do not think that he ever required anything more than that a bill or complaint laid before him should state a cause of which he knew the law gave him jurisdiction, and he did not require the special reasons to be set out why he had jurisdiction. Since he admits that Congress has jurisdiction of this inquiry, why not make it and trust the country to see what the Senators see, that we have complete, full, ample occasion to make the inquiry?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I admit that there is some force in what the Senator from Wisconsin has said, but for myself I think it always advisable, as far as possible, to avoid claiming a power about the existence of which there are serious doubts. I think the utmost delicacy is required in a system like ours, both on the part of the States and on the part of the Federal Government, that neither shall assume to claim or exercise powers which do not belong to it. It was for this reason and from an anxiety to prevent any difficulty or misconception growing out of this legislation that I offered the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 28, and the noes 18.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no; let it go.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Very well; I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. COOPER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (when the name of Mr. EDMUNDS was called.) My colleague is absent. I have no doubt that if he were present he would vote in favor of this bill. I believe that he is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.]

The call of the roll was concluded.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and myself were paired upon political questions. If this is a political question and the Senator will so state, I will consider myself paired with him. I do not so understand it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is not considered a political question on this side of the Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. I do not view it as a political question at all.

Mr. CONOVER. On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] Not regarding this as a political question, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Norwood, Ransom, Stevenson, and Wallace—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Burnside, Cockrell, Edmunds, Hitchcock, Kelly, Kernan, Merrimon, Randolph, Robertson, Saulsbury, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Whyte—15.

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: A bill to provide for the appointment of commissioners on the subject of the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic and manufacture.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1558) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of the said commissioners, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LAND ENTRIES WITHIN RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. HARVEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 34) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to hear the bill read for information.

The PRESID ENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I notice that this is a very wide-reaching bill, and I think it is the same one that my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] took some interest in at the last session and debated at considerable length. I should like to have it go over until my colleague is present; but if the Senator from Kansas merely desires to be heard on the bill I shall not object to taking it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Kansas moves to proceed to the present consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is not for any purpose of final action to-day, I understand.

Mr. HARVEY. I understand the bill to be taken up for consideration, and if final action can be reached to-day, I certainly hope it will be had. I have no desire to take it up simply for the purpose of making a speech. I have no desire to take it up except that it may be advanced to a final vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont that the Senate has ordered the present consideration of the bill, and it is now pending as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment and not subject to an objection.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President, there is a great question involved in this bill, a question as to the rights of the people under the laws of the United States. The homestead and pre-emption laws are general laws, upon compliance with which any person having the proper qualifications can acquire a right to land; and this right the public faith is pledged to support. These laws apply to all the public domain not specifically reserved from their operation.

The railroad grants are in the nature of floats, having at their inception no definite location.

It is necessary for the harmonious execution of these general and special laws relating to the same subject-matter that the general laws should be fully and completely operative until the definite boundaries within which the special laws are operative have been finally determined and made apparent to the officials having charge of the records and maps or plats by which they, upon the faith of the Government and in pursuance of law, allot the public lands to those who have the right thereto.

The grantees under special acts can only claim that their rights attach when the territory within which their grants lie has been definitely and officially segregated from the general domain by due notice from the proper official to the registers and receivers of the local land offices, for only then have these officials and the people whom they serve any means of determining the limitations to the operation of the general laws. While such was the ruling, but little if any difficulty or conflict occurred as to the rights of the claimants under the different laws. But latterly erratic and retroactive rulings have been made involving, among other absurdities, the idea that the right of a railroad company could attach to the lands while they were still subject to homestead and pre-emption entries, ignoring the fact that the railroad grants require the lands to be withdrawn from market after the railroad companies have filed their maps and that the order of withdrawal upon such filing is and must be necessarily the first official segregation of the territory within which the grant then becomes operative.

Under the late ruling referred to, thousands of worthy people, who have made entries in full conformity with the laws as construed and administered by the officers then charged with the duty of interpreting and executing them, are threatened with the loss of their homes, to which they have become legally and equitably entitled, with all the values and improvements given to these homes by the outlay of their money and years of industrious toil.

These homes must not be confiscated and the evidences of title canceled by administrative action based on the assumption that resolutions passed by boards of directors of private corporations "definitely fixing" the lines of railroads supersede the laws of the United States and official action in pursuance thereof; else would citizens of the United States have no rights which corporations are bound to respect and the determination of the rights of thousands of citizens to their homes become a matter of corporate action, instead of legislative, executive, or judicial proceeding.

Are we ready to abdicate Government in favor of corporations, to give them the power of construing laws and determining the rights of citizens thereunder? Shall boards of railroad directors, sitting privately in distant cities, taking action preliminary to the ultimate location of the boundaries within which their floating grants may be identified, but of which action neither the Government officials nor the settlers have any notification, be held to have thus acquired title to the homes of those settlers in defiance of general laws of the United States and regular official action in pursuance thereof?

It is necessary for the proper determination of the rights alike of the corporations and of individual claimants that there should be complete and early identification of the lands granted to the one or the other, but this identification must be made by the proper official authority. It is not the province of the grantee to determine what lands are granted under the different laws.

The Government maintains officials in every land district with authenticated records and plats ready to show claimants to what lands and under what conditions title may be acquired, and this is done upon the faith of the Government. Shall their official action be set aside, the evidence of title given by them be canceled by or upon such an unwarranted assumption? Such procedure must necessarily lead, as it has, to oppression and uncertainty as to rights and titles under all the laws, both general and special.

Solicitor Smith, in his opinion dated May 4, 1872, truly said:

It is of the utmost importance that titles given by the Department should rest on a firm and substantial basis; that they should be accepted and recognized as final adjudications by the Department of the rights in which they should be secure in their possessions, and that the public generally should have confidence in their stability. This result can never be attained if decisions once made by the Department upon full consideration of all the facts and within the scope of its authority be made subject to review by the same tribunal upon a change in its officers. Such a practice would render insecure every title from the Government and encourage controversy and litigation.

Yet, as you may easily see, such changes of rulings have taken place in that Department, and that the results have followed, and this legislation is asked for to avert the evils and great wrongs resulting therefrom. It does not legislate away vested rights. It merely corrects errors of administration and secures to the original claimant the evidences of title which belong to him under the general laws in pursuance of which the Government officials designated by law for that purpose have recognized his right. If any corporation possess equitable rights adverse to his they can be pleaded in court, under the charter or grant of franchise, but if the homestead or pre-emption certificate of the claimant be canceled, he is without color of title and is out of court—a victim of bad faith on the part of the Government through changes effected in the operation of law by executive misconstruction.

I shall show presently by reading from decisions of the Department that the operation of these laws has been changed, being in effect legislation by a Department, and that great wrongs have resulted therefrom. To put an end to departmental legislation we must resist the beginnings.

I will now read the papers that I have referred to. The first is a letter of Willis Drummond, then Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting to the Secretary of the Interior an appeal from his decision concerning certain contested cases of the character now under discussion.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, April 14, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith papers on appeal from the decisions contained in my letters to the district land officers at Independence, Kansas, dated February 24 last, Topeka, February 27, and Salina, February 24 and 28, and March 3 last, refusing to cancel the following homestead entries upon the application of the attorney for the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company, who claim the lands as inuring to the grant to said company, to wit.

Here follows a description of the entries at the different land offices at Independence, Topeka, and Salina; and the Commissioner proceeds:

These entries are of a similar character to those referred to in your decisions of September 3 and December 19 last, in the cases of A. W. Nickell et al., and Frank Hatke vs. The Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, having been made upon railroad lands after the definite location of the road, but before the date of withdrawal, in accordance with the rulings of the Department then in force—and as the grants are of the same character, it was in accordance with these decisions that I declined to cancel the entries. The further suggestion is made that the language of the fourth section of the act, requiring the Secretary, "as soon as said company shall file * * * maps of its line designating the route thereof, * * * to withdraw from the market the lands granted," presupposes the fact that such lands were intended to remain in market until such maps should be filed for the protection of the company, and if the withdrawal was made within a reasonable time after such filing the duty of the Secretary was performed under the law, and the company cannot take advantage of any laches of its own in failing to file such map immediately upon its definite location, and thereby securing to itself the full measure of its grant in place at that time and indemnity for such lands as had been then disposed of. After such definite location, and prior to the withdrawal, I do not understand the law to protect the company or to give any indemnity, as it was the business of the company, and not of the Department, to take the first steps, by filing, if necessary, a map of general route toward securing their grant unimpaired.

This view of the law is made necessary, in my judgment, in order to give effect to the provisions of the fourth section, under the rule requiring every portion of a statute to be enforced if its enforcement is possible without violation of what is clearly provided for in other parts of the same.

The first section simply defines the rights of indemnity under the grant generally made. The fourth section specifically sets forth the manner in which a withdrawal shall be made "to effect the purposes of the act, and subserve the public interest." The papers submitted are as follows: First, homestead paper, marked A; second, extracts of letters containing my decisions, B; third, attorney's letters and arguments, C.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

Hon. C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

The next paper that I shall read is the answer of the Secretary of the Interior:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 17, 1873.

SIR: I have examined the questions presented by your letter of April 14, 1873, transmitting the appeal of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company from recent decisions of your Office, refusing to cancel certain homestead entries of lands made within the limits of its grant subsequent to the definite location of the line of the road, but prior to the order of the Secretary withdrawing the lands from market.

Your claim in this case is based upon a conclusion of law supposed to have been adopted by the Acting Secretary in the recent cases of A. W. Nickell et al. and Frank Hatke vs. The Saint Jo and Denver Railroad Company. I learn from the Acting Secretary, who decided said cases, that he did it with the understanding that patents had actually been issued in each of them in accordance with the construction of law adopted by the Department and in force at the time the patents were issued. In point of fact, however, patents had not issued in such cases, or either of them, and the decisions of the Acting Secretary are capable of a construction never intended for them and have led to some confusion between your office and the Department, resulting from the mistake of fact upon which they were founded.

It was intended to be held in said cases that, inasmuch as patents had actually been executed in them in accordance with a construction of the act creating the railroad company which had been adopted by the Department and was in force at the time the patents were executed, they would be considered as res adjudicata and would not be disturbed, although the former rule of construction had been changed by the Department and a new and different one adopted, which new rule was in force at the time the cases were heard and decided.

There is an official admission by the Secretary himself that the ruling of the Department had been changed, and of course its operation changed, to the great detriment of the rights of the people.

The Secretary goes on to say:

I now hold, and you will adopt the rule for your future guidance in this case and all like it, that in all cases where patents have actually been executed in accordance with a construction of law adopted by the Department and in force at the time of the execution of the patents, the patents will not be canceled or set aside upon any subsequent controversy arising between the different claimants, but the parties will be left to their remedies in court and the cases will be treated as res adjudicata. But in all cases where the controversy arises before patent has been executed the rule of conclusion adopted by the Department and in force at the time of the hearing in all its stages and before any proper officer or officers will be applied and the case decided in accordance with it, although it may differ from the rule recognized by the Department at the time the respective proceedings were commenced.

Here is a plain admission that where parties had proceeded alike in accordance with law and in accordance with the rulings of the Department and in accordance with all the requirements of the Department up to a certain stage when the Department saw fit to change its rulings relating to such matter, those who had been so fortunate as to prosecute their claim for title to a decision and received a patent were safe and not to be touched in the future; but no matter how closely the law may have been complied with up to the time of the change of the ruling, if patent had not then been issued it availed the claimant nothing afterward toward procuring his patent; not only availed him nothing, but the practice of the Department was to cancel and render nugatory the evidence of title which had already been given to him.

The Secretary proceeds:

In the case now under consideration the right of the railroad attached upon the definite location of its road, and before any of the filings of the contesting parties were made. These filings were made before the withdrawal of the lands, but under the construction now adopted by this Department the right of the railroad attached at the time of definite location, and not, as formerly held, at the time of withdrawal. No patents have been executed, and under the law, as I understand it, and the rule above stated, the right of the railroad is superior to that of other parties, and your decision should be reversed. I therefore reverse the same, and herewith return the papers transmitted with your letter of April 14, 1873.

Very respectfully,

C. DELANO, Secretary.

Hon. W. DRUMMOND,
Commissioner General Land Office.

In an official letter to Hon. D. P. Lowe, under date of January 20, 1874, the Commissioner of the General Land Office says:

It is held by the Department that where a survey is made in accordance with a resolution of a board of directors of a company authorizing the same, the dates of such survey in the field are to be taken as the definite location of the road. But when the line of route is subsequently adopted by the board of directors as their definite location, the date of such adoption governs.

Here, Mr. President, is a singular ruling surely, a ruling dispensing with the laws, dispensing with the Government officers charged with the execution of the laws, and making the rights of the people turn not upon official action but upon the action of a corporation, a board of directors or their servants, the civil engineers who happen to be prosecuting a survey in the field at the time, ignoring the general homestead and pre-emption law, ignoring the officials that the Government keeps in every land district to determine as to the rights of different parties to the public lands, and making the law depend upon the action of the board of directors of a railway corporation or the engineers who happen to be executing a survey in the field.

As an American citizen, I look with what I regard as a justifiable jealousy upon any claim on the part of corporations to exercise any of the functions of Government officials. Such claim is not in accordance with the spirit of our institutions, and cannot be conceded by citizens of a free country.

In other times, in other countries, under monarchical governments, such systems have been tried and found unsafe, though, as in the case of the East India and other companies, they were chartered for operations not among the citizens or subjects of the governments granting the charters, but among those then regarded as aliens and heathen inhabitants of "remote parts." Against these they were given civil, military, and criminal jurisdiction. Charles II gave the British company power to make peace or war with any power not of the Christian religion. That company had a heterogeneous composition. Among others, many members of Parliament were voters at stockholders' meetings. It had a board of twenty-four directors, divided into three committees: One on finance and internal and maritime interests; one on politics and war; one on legislative and judicial interests; but most important of all was the secret committee, having correspondence with the board of control, which consisted of cabinet officers and others, and was the real governing power of the company, and became a court from whose decree there was no appeal.

The revolt in India of 1857 and 1858 made this idea of government by private corporations so odious, that the idea was abandoned in disgust and all the delegated powers were resumed by the government.

When Benton represented the statue of Columbus pointing westward and said, "There lies the east, there is India," he meant simply to point out a pathway for trade with India, not that the Indo-British system of the discharge of govermental functions through the servants of private corporations should be introduced in the great States and Territories traversed by land-grant railroads.

I am not a railer against corporations when they are kept within the scope of their proper powers. I have, when it was my duty so to do, repressed violence against them, but I am not ready to see their servants setting aside and rendering null and void the actions of officials of this Government done in pursuance of general laws of the most beneficent character. In defense of national honor we must put an end to such shameful wrongs, for besides the redemption of the currency and the payment of the public debt other things are required by national honor. Though Falstaff said, "Honor hath no skill in surgery," yet we know that this vindication of national honor would heal rankling wounds in many hearts, for the heart-strings of American men, women, and children cling about their homes. However humble they may be, a few year's occupation surrounds them with associations and memories that it seems like sacrilege to disturb with the information that the titles by which they have been held for years, though given in pursuance of general laws by regular Government officers, have been canceled in pursuance of a resolution of a board of railway directors.

The people who make homes upon the public lands in strict compliance with law must be protected therein. The strength of free government is in homes occupied by their owners. A great American poet says, "O fortunate, O happy day, which sees a new household take its place among the myriad homes of earth." Let us make it understood that henceforth the people of these households, the builders of these homes, shall be secure in their rights, and you so bind the hearts of a brave people in loyalty that your flag will "brave the battle and the breeze for more than a thousand years."

A wise government defends the rights of all its people. It was a politic remark made by Bismarck in the German Parliament when he said that the princes of Prussia had never been peculiarly the kings of the rich. Let us so act that it may always be truly said that the Senators of the United States have never countenanced the oppression of the poor, for the people whose homes are in jeopardy are poor indeed, far too poor to compete with the powerful corporations urging adverse claims by employing distinguished lobbyists to haunt these Halls in their interest.

It cannot be claimed that the passage of this bill would take away any vested right from railroad companies. As I stated before, these companies would still have the right to plead any adverse interest under the charter or grant of franchise and even though a patent has been issued.

The Supreme Court has decided that issuing a patent for public lands is a ministerial act to be performed according to law, and when it has been issued, whether fraudulent or not, without authority of law, it is void. Patents, say the court, are sometimes issued by mistake, when the officer has no authority in law to grant them; in such cases the patents are void. If an officer issues a patent for land reserved from sale by law, such patent is void for want of authority. The setting aside a patent is a judicial act and requires the judgment of a court.

It is idle, therefore, to object to the passage of this bill on the ground that it destroys vested interests or takes away equitable rights of railway companies.

The only effect of this bill is to give to the settler the evidence of title which, through its authorized agents, the Government agreed to give him, thus permitting him to have a day in court for the determination of equitable rights between him and the powerful corporations claiming adversely under the provisions of a charter. There is no danger that such corporations will suffer wrong. They never fail to secure able advocates in the courts or elsewhere.

As I stated in the beginning, the fact that the ruling of the Department of the Interior, to which I have referred, is now in force cancels the only evidence of title that these poor settlers have ever been granted. It leaves them utterly unable to go into court except as defendants. A way has already been provided by which the railroad company, if it sees fit to abandon a contest with a settler in a class of cases such as would be included under this bill, may indemnify itself by securing land elsewhere within the limits of the original grant. Its rights are already provided for. Shall the people, the true sufferers from these wrongs, be the only ones for whom there is no remedy?

For these poor settlers I appeal to you as Nehemiah to the rulers of old, "Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their oliveyards, and their houses."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator whether his bill applies to all the public lands of the United States?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is then to be a general law?

Mr. HARVEY. A general law.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If in any case the title to the lands in question is vested in the railroad companies and we should by any law say that it should go to the settlers, I suppose the United States would be liable to make good the land which we take from the railroads; that is, to compensate them for the property. Would not that be so?

Mr. HARVEY. Those advocating the passage of this bill claim that the title to such lands as this bill relates to cannot possibly have been vested in railroad companies. Even though the patent may have been given to them, it has been given in violation of law, and consequently the title could not have vested in them. This bill only refers to such of the public lands as have been claimed and occupied by settlers in strict compliance with the pre-emption and homestead laws.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then I understand that this bill is to determine in whom the title is?

Mr. HARVEY. No, sir; it is simply to confirm the title of those who have complied with the pre-emption and homestead laws, and whose rights have been disregarded by the Department of the Interior, as I think I showed very plainly from the papers which I read in the course of my speech.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that is only another way of stating the case. I understand this bill to declare who has the title. My friend says that this bill is to confirm the title of those who have it. Now it does not seem to me, although I have not examined this case, that it is the business of the legislative department of the Government to pass laws declaring in contested cases who shall have title, but that that question properly belongs to the judiciary. If it is so fixed that these lands belong to the settlers, I should be in favor of any legislation making it easy for them to go into the courts.

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to the fact that they cannot get into the courts, except as defendants, by reason of this outrageous ruling which destroys their evidence of title.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was going on to say, when my friend interposed, that I would be in favor of any legislation rendering it easy for these parties who are settlers, and who claim title, to get into the courts and have their titles adjudicated upon, but never in favor of having the legislative branch of the Government assume to settle a judicial question. It does seem to me that, having heard the remarks of the promoter of this bill, it would be well to let this matter go over, for it certainly is a matter of great importance to the Government, as it affects all the public lands.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, he will see by an examination of this bill that it simply provides that where a settler has, in strict compliance with the law and with the rulings of the Department in force at the time, made his claim and pursued it, his right shall not be defeated by subsequent and diametrically different rulings of the Department.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Kansas to the clause "or entries in compliance with any law of the United States." It seems to me this refers to what precedes, "all pre-emption and homestead entries." The entries may have been made in compliance with law, but they may not be lawful entries in the sense in which we are now considering it. I think the phraseology of the bill means merely that where entries were made according to the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States they shall be treated as valid, if this bill should become a law, whether the land was open for entry or not.

Mr. SARGENT. This is something more than a judicial question.

The bill designs practical legislation. It is not only within the power of Congress to enact such legislation, but it would be discreet to do so. I call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the second section of this bill, which provides for a case which, put before the courts, I think the courts, without some definite legislation, would be somewhat puzzled to decide. The second section provides that, where there are pre-emption or homestead entries made in good faith and subsequently abandoned, the tractf embraced by those entries shall be re-opened for pre-emption or homestead by subsequent parties going upon them, and that they shall not go to the railroad company. There are a thousand reasons why they should not go to the company, and not one why the railroad company should have the land.

The original law in all cases giving grants of land to railroad companies provides that they shall not take lands upon which there are any pre-emption or homestead entries, where they exist at the time of the grant or withdrawal; that that in itself, no matter what afterward becomes of them, shall prevent the railroad companies from taking those particular tracts of lands upon which their grant may be located. Now, by a species of delays of a thousand kinds, generally arising out of the fault of the railroad companies, these pre-emption or homestead entries are abandoned. There is a bill now pending in the other House to extend for eight years the time for which the land grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall run. What will be the effect of that? Men who entered upon that land half a dozen years ago and filed a pre-emption have to wait eight years longer before they can get any title from the Government of the United States, before there will be any survey. Men die upon these lands or become bankrupt and are sold out, or men wish to change their place of business and go to some other State; they leave that pre-emption in an inchoate state; they cannot get their title for want of a survey or some other reason, and the present owner finds, although he innocently has paid a hundred or five hundred or a thousand dollars for the land and the improvements which the first settler put upon it, that he has got a mere blank piece of paper. The laws of the United States provide that he shall not take under a prior pre-emptor. The railroad companies understand very well that that works an abandonment; that when the first owner leaves the land he must abandon it although the land may be capable of cultivation, he may be raising fine crops, although there may be barns and a homestead in which a happy family was reared. That being sold under these circumstances to a new purchaser who may be innocent of the fact that the transaction works abandonment, the railroad company applies to the Land Office, goes forward and gets the land, and the man who bought it of the original settler is dispossessed.

The second section provides that in cases like that, and in all cases of technical abandonment, the land shall not go to the railroad company but to the person subsequently entering. Then the man who buys takes from the time of his purchase, and is not ousted by the fact that some years before there was a grant made to a railroad company which never used any diligence to get a survey of it, and which under a dozen pretenses refused to take the conveyance of the land from the Government. One reason of this delay is that the corporations do not want to be taxed for that land in advance of its sale by them. Many reasons they have why they do not try to have these land titles settled, believing that they can weary out the pre-emptors and the homestead settlers, and get it by this species of abandonment.

It is said that this is a judicial question and that the courts can pass upon it. If they do, they act on the strict letter of the law, which says that a person must be in uninterrupted possession from the day he claims as pre-emptor down to the time he receives his patent, and must not have made conveyances to any one else. This is the strict letter of the law which the Supreme Court, or any other court, can only interpret in one way. What can Congress do in this case? Here comes in this foreign interest, this railroad company, which sinks into the hole which is made between the possession of the first settler and the possession of the second, and says "Our rights intervene, and this land so improved belongs to us." I say that Congress ought to come forward and lay down a rule which, if it does not reach previous cases, at any rate shall apply to all future cases, that when land is thus lost by the first possessor the second may take it, and that the railroad company, prohibited by the original grant from having it, shall not receive it.

With reference to the first section of the bill perhaps a question of law might be raised. It is a question of equity also. It is a question which Congress is perfectly competent to pass upon. The assumption of the Land Office is that it is not necessary that there shall be any local notice to settlers of the withdrawal of the lands; it is only necessary for the directors of a corporation to get together in their back parlor and, in the intervals of smoking cigars, to order that a certain survey or a certain withdrawal shall take place in compliance with the law of Congress. There is no notice to settlers, and from that day they claim the land though notice has not been given, or certainly not through the accredited channels, the local land offices. I believe there is no law on the statute-books which, properly and fairly construed, would lead to such a conclusion. If there is, we had better amend it, certainly for all future time. This is not to advise courts particularly, but it is to advise our officers who have to pass on these very questions; and if it is called to the attention of Congress that they are making extraordinary decisions like these, the effect of every one of which is to oust a hundred or a thousand settlers from their homes, and to further aggrandize great railroad companies who have received such magnificent grants of the public domain, and can hold them by a species of mortmain, it seems to me that Congress should act upon such considerations, and pass some such bill as this.

I do not see any feature of this bill that is not in the interest of justice, and fairness, and the rights of the settlers; and I wish to say to the Senators from the East that we derive just as much benefit, and a great deal more, from the settlers coming on our vacant lands, occupying them, building up their homes, and engaging in their trades as farmers and mechanics, &c., than we do from railroad companies, and a great deal more. If there is to be any partiality toward either, we ask it on behalf of the settlers. We claim, however, that this is simply right; that the rulings of the Land Office, our servants, ought to be corrected.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I have examined this bill as well as I could in the short time that I have been able to look at it. I think the second and third sections of the bill are entirely unobjectionable. I have no objection to make to either, although the second section appears on examination to be somewhat ambiguous; but it is to the first section of the bill that I wish to make a few remarks, and only a few.

I will not say that that section asserts a principle which is wrong, but it asserts one which I am not satisfied is right. It will be noticed that this bill applies to all the land grants made for railway purposes from the time that policy was first entered upon by the Government. The acts are very numerous, extending through many years. It is general in its operation. Now I wish to read the first section for the purpose of calling attention to the principle which I think is involved in it and which deserves more consideration, it seems to me, than it has yet received.

That all pre-emption and homestead entries, or entries in compliance with any law of the United States, of the public lands, made in good faith by actual settlers, upon tracts of land of not more than one hundred and sixty acres each, within the limits of any land grant—prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated, or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office, and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with, and proper proofs thereof have been made by the parties holding such tracts or parcels, they shall be confirmed, and patents for the same shall issue to the parties entitled thereto.

Now, I understand this bill to assert precisely this principle: that although a grant may have been made to a State for railroad purposes, or may have been made directly to a railroad company, and the road located and the lists of the land made out and sent in here and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, yet, after all this, the title has not passed to the company until notice of that location and of the withdrawal of the lands has been sent to the local land office. That is the principle asserted here; and it is a principle, it will be seen at once, of considerable moment. It is one of the justice of which, or the legality of which, I am not satisfied; and it seems to me that in order to come to a just conclusion involves the necessity of examining every law granting lands for railroad purposes that has ever been passed, because any man can see at a glance that the question when the title took effect might depend somewhat upon the language of the act making the grant. I have not had time to make that examination. If other Senators have, they are more fortunate than I am and better prepared to vote on this question. It seems to me, therefore, to involve a legal question of great consequence, and one which ought to be thoroughly examined before we adopt it. I shall therefore move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion, I believe, is debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALCORN in the chair.) Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I introduced this bill, Mr. President, at the present session after much deliberation upon the principle involved and the objects sought to be attained. It has been considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and reported favorably.

Mr. WRIGHT. As it was last session.

Mr. INGALLS. It was also, as I was about to remark, before the Senate at the last session of Congress—was before the same committee and received the same action. It was called up on one or two occasions, but at the request of various Senators and through the exigencies of debate was laid over, from time to time, and failed to receive definitive action.

The Senator from Michigan, in my judgment, correctly states the question that is presented for the consideration of the Senate, which is to ascertain and determine at what period of time a grant of lands to a railroad corporation becomes operative. The first act giving a land subsidy to a railroad was passed September 20, 1850, and the last one March 30, 1871, and during this interval nearly one hundred corporations were endowed, more than twenty millions of acres having been thus granted in the State of Kansas alone.

Until within the last three years the decision of the Executive Departments of the Government has been uniform to the effect that the operation of those grants in favor of the railroad companies commenced when the lands were withdrawn from market at the local land offices in the districts where they were situated. That has been the uniform current of the decisions of the Secretaries of the Interior, the Commissioners of the General Land Office, and all persons who had anything to do with the execution of these laws. But within the last two or three years an extraordinary change has come over the spirit of their dream. The statutes that had theretofore been construed in favor of the settlers, the statutes that had theretofore been construed in accordance with the simplest and plainest principles of the common law in regard to the time when adverse and conflicting transfers of real estate became effective, by some subtle, unexplained, and mysterious influence have been entirely reversed in their interpretation; and now, instead of holding that grants of land in favor of railroad corporations become operative at the time when they are withdrawn at the local land office, the Interior Department promulgates the opinion that they become operative when the line of the road is definitely fixed in accordance with a vote of the board of directors of the railroad company.

Now, sir, the question that lies at the basis of all this inquiry is ultimately one of law. When does a grant of lands to a railroad corporation by one of these statutes become operative as a matter of law? Is it an actual grant in præsenti of land, or is it merely a grant to become operative when the lands are definitely ascertained, designated, and separated from the public domain? That is really the question at issue in this discussion; and this bill declares in the seventh, eighth, and ninth lines of the first section that period to be "the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated."

When could these grants become fixed? When could they become operative? There are but three conditions under which they could become effectual to convey a title to the beneficiaries. The first would be when the line of the road had been designated generally by the board of directors. That might be held to be one period. The second would be when there had been an actual survey made in the field. And the third would be that defined in this bill, when the notice of the withdrawal is received at the local land office. Now, which one of these interpretations ought to prevail? Plainly, under every principle of law, under every principle of equity and justice, the last. Every one knows that whenever conflicting conveyances of real estate are made by mortgage or by deed as between the grantor and his grantees that conveyance of which notice is first given by recording in the proper office as required by law is the one that is effectual and carries the title.

The Senator from New Jersey shakes his head.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly do.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator from New Jersey does not deny my proposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly do deny that a deed only takes effect from the time it is recorded.

Mr. INGALLS. I contend that as between parties claiming under the same grantor the party who has used diligence and put his deed upon record and given notice to the world is the one who will secure the title.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know any State where there is not a certain number of days given for the purpose of recording a deed. In our State it is fifteen days. But the deed takes effect in præsenti, and I think that is uniformly so. I only shook my head because I wanted to call my friend's attention to this point: What would be the effect if the law should be made, for the future even, as he suggests, that the grant did not take effect until the lands were withdrawn from the local land office? There would be a period after the grant was made, after the line of the road was located, before the lands were withdrawn from the local land office, and it would be a notice to everybody that here are public lands which are to be increased in value tenfold because there is to come a railroad right along by them. It seems to me it would be a notice that would induce speculators to seize upon those lands.

But another difficulty which I will state, as I am on my feet and do not propose to interrupt my friend again, is this: When the grant takes effect, may be different in different grants, and depends upon the terms of the grant. I suppose this bill would be much less objectionable if it contained the provision that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect vested rights.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator knows that the bill could not affect vested rights should it become a law.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not.

Mr. INGALLS. No legislation can deprive a person of vested rights without making compensation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then there is no objection to stating it.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no objection to incorporating the moral law or the Ten Commandments in a statute, but it would be certainly superfluous.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No. That would be foolish; this would not be foolish.

Mr. SARGENT. There would be an objection in reference to the second section to stating anything of the kind, because the "vested rights" are under an obvious misconstruction of the law in the case to which I referred. I should like to call attention to that very case, where there is a pre-emptor in perfect good faith who has lived upon the land which has been apparently granted to a railroad company, who was there before the grant was made, who, desiring to change his place of business and live elsewhere, there being no survey so that he can get title from the Government of the United States, and no prospect of a survey, sells his lands, which are valuable to him and valuable to the purchaser, for a certain price, and that is treated as an abandonment by the Land Office, and the person who buys from him receives nothing, but the railroad company comes in and takes the land. What are you going to say about "vested rights" in a case like that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would say, Mr. President, that there is a statute, section 2450 of the Revised Statutes, which provides:

> The Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized to decide, upon principles of equity and justice, as recognized in courts of equity, and in accordance with regulations to be settled by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney-General, and the Commissioner, conjointly, consistently with such principles, all cases of suspended entries of public lands and of suspended pre-emption land claims, and o adjudge in what cases patents shall issue upon the same.

I think that under that law, in the case which my friend has supposed, where a settler had made his actual location, had settled and made his home, and a grant was made including that, the Commissioner would have a perfect right to except that from the grant.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator that that is the very difficulty complained of, that under such sections as that the rulings are changed.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly; and who ever heard of the principles of equity as administered by any court overruling a positive statute? The companies claim that here is a positive statute which says that a pre-emption right shall date only from the entry of the person who claims under it upon the land. What connection is or can there be by the positive statute between him and the person who preceded him, whom he has bought out? The law says in effect that there shall be no such relation and that such a sale is evidence of fraud. Consequently they contend that under that section there is no opportunity for applying the principles of equity. They are absolutely excluded, and the cold, naked law is applied; the railroad company gets the land, and, by the thousand, settlers in my State are ousted from land where their children have been born and raised. It is a crying evil and nuisance.

So in all these States; and I say to Senators in the East who sit in your comfortable homes and do not have such troubles pressed on your attention by your constituents, you ought to listen to us when we tell you that here is our trouble, that our people are persecuted by such grievances as these. If you say this bill does not reach the difficulty, advise us how it can be improved. According to our best judgment it does reach the difficulty, and it is not unjust.

Furthermore, if the gentleman insists that there is a contract between the Government of the United States and the railroad companies by which they are entitled to this "pound of flesh," I say we have a right then to set aside that, and if equity requires it we ought to do so; and there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States that inhibits it. So the Supreme Court themselves decided in the legal-tender cases. The constitutional provision on that subject is simply a restriction on the States. There is no question about the power of Congress to do it.

The Senator asks, may we not have a bill to pay if we do it? Suppose that by the harsh interpretation of our laws, which we allow to go on from day by day and year by year, men are rendered homeless and driven out from their homes which they themselves have created, in order that railroad companies may seize their land, and we come in and remove that state of things and thereby in equity the Government owes a sum of money to the railroad companies, had we not better pay it than to carry misery and desolation to masses of people? I think so; but I do not believe that consequence arises. I do not think that, either by equity or law as Congress administers it and administers it by this bill, any such claim would arise. When it does come, I shall be prepared to meet it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend from California reminds me that the constitutional provision that the obligation of contracts shall not be impaired only applies to the States, and not to the United States. I am perfectly aware of that; but I am also aware that there is a higher principle than that which applies to the United States: the very spirit of that provision; and to dispute it is to advocate repudiation. There is the same obligation upon the United States to keep its contract, whether it be with settler, bondholder, or railroad company, that there is upon any person to be honest. It is a principle that lies in the nature of things, and, as I remember, one author says, a principle which controls the Deity itself. Now, if we are not about to violate that great principle, there can be no objection to introducing into this bill a proviso "that nothing herein contained shall be construed to violate or impair vested rights;" and, with that provision, I will vote for it.

Mr. SARGENT. I showed before that that would simply render the whole bill nugatory; and the Senator has not replied to the instance which I gave, where by a misconstruction of the law, obvious in itself—the Senator will not contend that it was anything but a misconstruction of the law—these companies are gaining an unfair and an unconscionable advantage; and I claim the pious principle which he here lays down with such a solemn air, as applicable in favor of this bill, because it remedies that great injustice; and I say that he has no right to shut his ears and refuse to listen to the principles of equity and justice and righteousness which he appeals to, when they make in behalf of the poor settler; because some railroad company, or railroad companies generally, may insist that it is an infringement of their vested right to seize upon the property which the policy of the law has given to others.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If this bill applied only to future cases and future facts, the principle of it would be entirely right and it should have my vote at once. It would raise then no doubt whatever in my mind.

It has been suggested by the Senator from California a moment ago that Congress would have the power to do what a State could not do in a matter of this kind. Does he mean by that to say that it is in the power of Congress to divest the title of a railroad company if that is already vested in it? Can Congress do that?

Mr. CONKLING. Without compensation?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. And without compensation.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no idea that the Government has a right to take private property for public use or for any other use, without compensation.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Then does the Senator mean to say that here would be compensation given? Is it one of those cases that has ever been recognized as a case for compensation? Suppose this title had actually vested in the railroad company, is there a case in the whole history of our Government like it—an undertaking to divest it by act of Congress?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not claim that this does divest the railroad companies of any right. I simply say that by improper construction of our servants, not judicial officers but ministerial officers, the land, the property of settlers, is taken and given to these corporations. The Senator objects, and says: "Why, if you do that you violate the obligation of contracts." I say, no, we do not do anything of the kind; and I say that there is no constitutional inhibition even if we did. That is all. But if we do injure a party by taking his rights, and the consequence follows which he insists that we shall make compensation in damages, I say, very well, I am ready to meet that question when it comes.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. So far as the question of contract is concerned, it is entirely a different thing. The question is one arising after a contract has become executed, and has become property. It is property now instead of mere contract, if the title is vested in the railroad company prior to notice received at the local land office. I will say now to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] that I am willing to go as far as any other man for the protection of these settlers, just as far as he can satisfy me that it is competent for us to go without violating legal rights.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the opposers of this bill are endeavoring to "darken council by words without wisdom" in their efforts to draw into this controversy a vast number of extraneous subjects that are absolutely without connection with the issue before us.

This is not a question of contract. It is not a question affecting the rights of the railroad companies to their lands. It is not a question determining whether the railroad corporation or the settler shall have the lands. But it is a bill laying down a rule of construction and interpretation, and declaring to the executive ministers of this Government how they shall construe the statutes that we have enacted. And I may say in passing that the section of the Revised Statutes read by the Senator from New Jersey lies at the very root and foundation of all this trouble. We have the anomaly in our form of government of a merely executive or ministerial officer like the Commissioner of the General Land Office endowed with functions that are purely judicial. The Commissioner of the General Land Office under our statutes has certain executive and ministerial duties to perform. He discharges those duties, and then the statute comes in and confers upon him the very extraordinary power of sitting in judgment upon his own acts.

Mr. MERRIMON. Pro tanto a judge.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, pro tanto a judge. After he has issued a patent, after he has in his ministerial capacity done all that he can in connection with a land grant, the statute says that if a controversy arises between the railroad corporation and the Government, or between the settler and the Government, or between the railroad corporation and the settler, he shall exercise judicial functions in passing upon the validity of the acts that he has himself performed, and that without the right of appeal. It is absolutely impossible for any man or any corporation, after its rights have been once passed upon by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and an appeal taken to the Secretary of the Interior, who is himself an executive officer, to obtain any review of that decision. There is no appeal from it; it is absolute. So, sir, I say that one great cause of all this difficulty arises in that extraordinary provision of law which allows this executive officer to determine when these grants shall become operative and take effect.

Now, sir, what does this bill propose to do? Merely to say to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and to the Secretary of the Interior that in their interpretation of these statutes, as the final and solemn judgment of this body, as one of the branches that assisted in their enactment, the grants of lands to railroad corporations shall become effective only when the notice of the withdrawal has been lodged with the local land officers in the district through which the roads run. So plain, and so just, and so equitable is this construction that, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, this has been the rule—and I beg the Senator from New Jersey to bear that in mind—that this has been the rule of every Secretary of the Interior, of every Commissioner of the General Land Office, since the land grant railroad system began in 1850 down to the time when Columbus Delano was the incumbent of the Interior Department and Willis Drummond was the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Then it is for us to determine whether this is a legitimate, proper, reasonable rule of construction; whether it is just for the Senate to say, as between the railroad corporation and the settler, that the railroad shall have the land if it has lodged a notice of withdrawal in the office of the local land officers through whose district the road may run.

As an illustration of the hardship and of the peculiarity, to use the mildest term that can be employed, which have characterized the orders on this subject during the last few years, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the decisions of the General Land Office and of the Secretary of the Interior in regard to a few of the principal railroad corporations in my own State.

The grant to the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston road was held to attach from the date of the adoption by the board of directors of the line of survey, which as to a portion of the road was November 15, 1866, and as to the remainder October 15, 1867. Now mark the practical operation of this. As to the former, the withdrawal of the lands was by an order of April 30, 1867, and the order of withdrawal of the latter was January 21, 1868, leaving an intervening period during which this land was apparently open to every settler who might come as to a portion of the line of five months and to the remaining portion of three months.

Then, in the case of the Missouri River, Fort Scott, and Gulf Railroad, the grant was held to attach from the date of the adoption of the survey by the board, February 11, 1868, but the lands were not withdrawn from market in the local land offices of the districts through which the road ran until June 12 and October 19, 1869, leaving as to the first withdrawal a period of one year and four months, and as to the second withdrawal a period of one year and eight months.

Now, what is the practical result of this? This land is open to homestead and pre-emption settlement. A settler goes to the local land office at Humboldt, or at Wichita, or at any other of the offices in my State; he asks the register to show him the plats of the land that are open for settlement in his district. The register exhibits to him the maps and field-notes. The homestead or pre-emption settler, after inspection, which shows no line of survey, no contemplated or proposed construction of railroads, selects the quarter-section upon which he desires to construct his home. He returns to the land office and pays the fees that are requisite for that purpose. No notice is given him that the land is not open; he has no means of knowing that the land is claimed by any corporation or any other citizen. He proceeds to fence and inclose it. He builds him a house. He puts his improvements upon it. He transfers, it may be, the whole of his worldly possessions to it; and a year and eight months afterward, without any previous intimation, without any opportunity of knowing that this land has been claimed by any other individual or corporation, he suddenly receives notice from the register of the land office that his entry has been canceled. Why? Because a year and eight months previous, in Boston, or New York, or in Chicago, or wherever else these corporations may have their head offices, a private resolution was passed adopting as their definite line of location a route which embraces the tract upon which he has settled. He therefore by that order becomes a trespasser; he is without a shadow of title. He cannot get into court if he wants to do so, because the evidence of his title has been canceled. The land is patented to the railroad company, not alone a naked tract of land but an improved farm, that contains the earnings, it may be, of a life-time of a man who has honestly settled upon it at the invitation of the Government. Does anybody pretend to tell me that that is a legal, equitable, or justifiable interpretation of the law, especially in the face of the fact that the contrary construction had been, in the opinion of previous executive officers of this Government, so just, so proper, and so equitable that until a period I think not more remote than four years the interpretation for which I contend had been uniformly adopted?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the Senator whether, taking the case that he has cited, he considers the title or claim to title in the railroad company to be a valid claim in law or otherwise? I desire to know what the Senator means.

Mr. INGALLS. I contend that, as a principle of law which I believe cannot be controverted, a grant of lands to a railroad company——

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not want the general question considered, if the Senator please.

Mr. INGALLS. The general includes the particular, and by stating the principle I supposed I could answer the Senator's question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The question I desire to have answered is whether in the opinion of the Senator from Kansas as a matter of law the title or claim to title in the railroad company in the instance cited is good or otherwise?

Mr. INGALLS. Manifestly the claim of the railroad company to any specific individual tract of land can only become valid when that specific tract of land has been designated so that it can be ascertained by metes and bounds.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I dare say a metaphysician might know whether the Senator has given a specific answer to my inquiry, but I confess I do not.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is not a metaphysician!

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to know whether, in the opinion of the Senator from Kansas, in the instance put by him, the title of the railroad company is a good title or not—whether it can be sustained in the courts or otherwise?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It cannot be sustained. Then the next question I desire to ask is whether the settler-claimant has now any means of getting into court and having an adjudication.

Mr. INGALLS. Absolutely none.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then will not this whole case be covered if we pass a law giving to settlers claiming title to lands under the Government of the United States upon which there is an adverse title a right to go into court and have the adverse claim dissipated?

Mr. INGALLS. It would be a partial remedy, and better than none.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It will answer that case exactly, in my opinion.

Mr. INGALLS. But the difficulty in the enactment of a statute like that, while I have no doubt what the decisions of the courts would be, is that it would entail upon the settlers and the contestants a vast amount of expense that in my judgment they ought not to be expected to bear.

Mr. MORTON. And contesting with powerful corporations.

Mr. INGALLS. And with powerful corporations, as the Senator from Indiana suggests, who have their agents already on this floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the corporations be annihilated or their power to litigate in the courts be destroyed or even disturbed by this bill if it should become a law?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will not the corporations be able to litigate against the settlers-claimant just as much under this bill?

Mr. INGALLS. The corporations have no desire to litigate. They are in possession of the land; they are in possession of the evidences of title; they are in possession of all the improvements made by the settlers, and why should they want to litigate? What inducement, or object, or purpose have the railroad corporations to litigate when they have everything? They possess the patent, the muniment of title, the improvements placed upon the land by the settlers, and why should they come into court to determine whether their title is valid or not? The Senator knows, or should know, that in actions of ejectment, in which I suppose this matter could alone be tried, the plaintiff must stand upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's. He must show affirmatively his right to be in court, and the settler cannot get into court. He has no power, he has no muniment of title. It has been denied him; or, if he ever had one, it has been canceled by order of the Department that issued it, sitting in judgment, as I said, upon its own act.

There was one suggestion made by the Senator from New Jersey to which I would like briefly to call attention, and that is in regard to the injurious effects which might follow the enactment of this law by permitting persons who desired to take up the lands in advance of a definite location, thus allowing vast tracts of the national domain to fall into the hands of speculators. I wish the Senator had followed that point a step further and inquired what would be the effect if this interpretation of the law is allowed to prevail so far as the railroad corporations themselves are concerned in their relations to the country. If the title of those corporations becomes operative and valid and effective whenever by vote of a board of directors the line of their road has been located, what necessity is there for their ever giving notice to anybody that they have obtained the title to the land? They do not require a patent to secure title. They do not require the actual possession of the land to secure title. The decision is that by a vote of the board of directors in their private office definitely locating the line, and by that act alone, the title becomes vested in them. If that is the case, will the Senator from New Jersey tell me what is the use or where is the necessity for these railroad corporations ever further to assert their title? Can they not simply withhold all interference with the land, allow it to be entirely occupied and taken up by homestead and pre-emption settlers, remain for twenty years, it may be, in possession of those settlers, and after it has immeasurably increased in value, after it has become covered with the aggregated wealth of an entire community, can they then not come in and say, "This land is withdrawn from market; it is ours; you have gone upon it in defiance of law and against our rights," and thereby secure not only the land itself but the wealth of an entire community?

Mr. WRIGHT. In the line of the Senator's argument, allow me to suggest to him in that connection that it is at least doubtful whether these settlers would have any such color of title, any such claim as that they could rest upon an adverse possession, and so the twenty years might not be sufficient to prevent the railroad companies from such an action; and so they might let the settlers remain for any number of years and let the property increase in value ever so much, because, as these settlers, according to the theory of the railroad company, have no claim or color of title, they could not be regarded as being in hostile possession, but mere trespassers, who could be dispossessed at any time.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly there is nothing to prevent that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In answer to the question which my friend from Kansas put to me I wish to say that I only threw that out as a difficulty in fixing the time that the grant should be considered to take effect. If it did not take effect until the lands were withdrawn from the local land office, I saw that it would be a temptation, inasmuch as there are telegraphs all over the country, to have those lands seized where a railroad is to be built. It may be as my friend suggests that there are greater difficulties on the other side. His argument may be good, for I am not here the champion either of settlers or of corporations. I think there is force in what the Senator says, and he will bear me witness that I stated distinctly that I would vote for the bill if he would put in a proviso that it shall not impair obligations or vested rights. I will not vote for it without that provision, and I do not see how anybody can do so.

Mr. INGALLS. Nobody knows better than the Senator from New Jersey, whose eminent legal attainments are as familiar to the whole country as they are to the Senate, that we cannot by any act interfere with or destroy vested rights. I think the Senator will admit that proposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do.

Mr. INGALLS. Then what is the use of declaring by a special enactment what he himself admits is totally superfluous and unnecessary? I want this matter left precisely as this bill leaves it, as a declaration of the principles that shall control the executive officers of this Government in connection with the location of railroad grants.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend puts the question to me whether we could by any legislation here impair vested rights? "Vested rights" may have two meanings. If you take the interpretation of "vested rights" in the sense in which the Senator from California takes it, that there is no constitutional obligation on this Government not to impair a contract, then it is possible that declaratory legislation might interfere with vested rights; but nothing can interfere with the obligation of this Government to keep its faith.

Mr. INGALLS. That is a proposition which meets my hearty concurrence.

Mr. HARVEY. That is just what we assert.

Mr. INGALLS. And certainly when the Senator from New Jersey says that he is neither an advocate of corporations nor the advocate of settlers, but stands as an arbiter between the contending claims of both, I might agree with him in that as constituting a proper definition of my own situation; although I must confess that in a contest like this my leaning is in favor of the weak and the humble as against the mighty, the wealthy, and the powerful; but still I would not permit considerations of that nature, so far as I could avoid it, to determine my action or to swerve my judgment.

This is not a question, Mr. President, between the railroad corporation and the settler; and that is one difficulty which the Senator from New Jersey appears to me to have labored under, and of which I think he ought to be disabused. It is not a question between the railroad corporation and the settler; but, as has been said in this debate, between the Government and its grantees; whether or not the Government shall carry out the strict obligations of honor and good faith toward those to whom it has conveyed portions of the public domain. Here are two claimants to a specific, segregated, individual quarter section of land. As between these rival claimants, under the common grantor, the Government of the United States, what rule of interpretation will the Government adopt, and to whom will it award the title to the land? The railroad company asserts that by virtue of the grant itself they become entitled to the land as soon as they have adopted a given line of survey. The settler says: "Inasmuch as I went to the local land office by your invitation, and your servants, the register and receiver, invited me to purchase that land and took my money for it, and there was no rival or hostile claimant, and in pursuance of that I have invested my money, given my labor and my time, and placed my accumulations upon that land, in accordance with the ordinary rules that govern the transfer and conveyance of real estate, the land should belong to me." The railroad company by this interpretation loses nothing, because under the provisions of all these laws if they lose any portion of the grant to which they would be entitled, by the claims of other parties, they have the right of indemnity selection outside of their grant; but if the contrary rule of interpretation prevails the settler loses his all.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the principle involved in this bill I regard as important. I have had my attention called before to some of the hardships growing out of the rulings complained of. It occurs to me that this bill vindicates itself by its reading, and I invite the attention of the Senate to the first section. But I would premise with the remark that in the construction of general grants of land to railroad or other corporations such grants should be strictly construed; that is to say, a corporation in perfecting its title should be held to a strict compliance with the law, whereas a liberal construction should rather be adopted toward private individuals who are to be affected by such general grants. The first section of this bill begins as follows:

That all pre-emption and homestead entries, or entries in compliance with any law of the United States, of the public lands—

The first condition is that it shall be an entry in compliance with law. It must be of land that is open to entry. If the land is not open to entry on the books of the land office and under the law, it is not touched by this bill. The first condition then is that the land must be open to entry. The next is:

of the public lands, made in good faith—

The entry must be made in good faith. If an actual settler goes upon a piece of land knowing that that land has in fact been granted to a railroad company, and that the company will ultimately claim it, and must, under the circumstances, it would then be a question whether it was done in good faith. For example, suppose that a railroad company now has made its location, has transmitted that location to the General Land Office here; but it has not been sent from the General Land Office here to the local land offices. If, during this interregnum, an actual settler, knowing that the railroad company had located its line and had claimed a particular piece of land, should go on to that land and take advantage of his knowledge, it would not be in good faith. The precise case covered by this bill is that of land open to entry, in the first place, and, in the second, the entry must be made in good faith.

My friend from New Jersey speaks of men obtaining a knowledge of the location of a railroad and then rushing in to get the land as a speculation. Let him bear in mind that a man can take but one piece of land, and he must go and live upon it. It is not the case of buying land in large quantities to take advantage of the construction of a railroad. The settler can have but one piece of land and he must live on it; he must be an actual settler; and his actual settlement gives notice always to the railroad company. My friend from New Jersey says that a grantee has three months to record a deed in his State. So he has in mine.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I said fifteen days in my State.

Mr. MORTON. Well, it is three months in my State; but suppose he does not record his deed at all. A subsequent grantee must take notice that there is some one on the land and will be held bound by a knowledge of adverse possession; and if a railroad company takes a grant or makes a location, or files its selection, with the knowledge of actual settlers or without that knowledge, if there be actual settlers on the land, upon the ordinary principle of law it should take notice of the adverse possession. But we will go on:

by actual settlers upon tracts of land of not more than one hundred and sixty acres each, within the limits of any land grant, prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated, or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office, and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with, and proper proofs thereof have been made.

It presupposes that everything has been done by the actual settler that he is required to do. The land must be open to entry; it must be entered in good faith; and he must have complied with the law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. At what period can the settler enter upon the land? What must be the condition of the line of the road?

Mr. MORTON. I suppose that he can enter upon the land at any time under the law before the lands have been withdrawn from the market.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I mean can he enter upon the lands before surveys are made by the Government?

Mr. MORTON. I do not know about that.

Mr. PADDOCK. He may make a claim before the land is surveyed.

Mr. MORTON. He can make a claim, I suppose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do I understand that a settler or a person desiring to enter under the homestead act can enter on any public lands of the country, after the proper survey, and acquire a right? Is that the Senator's understanding?

Mr. PADDOCK. Under the pre-emption law he may do so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This applies to the rights of settlers?

Mr. MORTON. I am taking the case put by this bill, and, in that point of view, it is hardly necessary for me to be able to answer my friend from Maine. I am taking the case that the land is open to entry, surveyed or unsurveyed. The bill provides, first, that the land must be open to entry, and that the entry shall be made in accordance with the law, and, in the next place, that it must be made in good faith. Now I come to the next question in regard to the railroad companies. I will suppose that a grant of land has been made by Congress to a State corporation, a railroad company, to run, if you please, from Topeka to Atchison in Kansas. The route is not located. It may be upon one side or the other side of the river; it may be in one range of congressional townships, or it may be in another. The location of the road depends upon the corporation itself. It may never be located. Some of the railroad corporations never organize, and sometimes these lands are never taken. No one can tell where the road is to go; no one evens knows that the land will ever be taken. While this uncertainty exists and the corporation has not made its location, the actual settler takes possession. He does it in good faith; he takes land open to entry. Afterward the railroad company comes in and locates its road; it designates the route and files its map in the Land Office, indicating the land it intends to claim. That is held by the ruling now to divest the title of the actual settler. It seems to me that the principle of the case is very plain. If the land was located and the settler knew or could know it by going to the land office, and could find it out certainly, then he has no claim in equity or in law; but until the location is made nobody can tell where the railroad is going; nobody can tell what land that railroad company is to have, and it is open to entry to the whole world. The railroad company comes in afterward and designates its route, files the designation in the General Land Office, and then claims to divest the title of the actual settler. This bill is simply to prevent that wrong, as I understand it.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, I will state a case, within my knowledge, where, at the instance of the company, the lands along a particular route were withdrawn from market. Outside of the lands thus withdrawn from market homesteaders and pre-emptioners entered. The company, however, in their private room, located their road and located it on such a line as to reach lands outside of the lands thus withdrawn from market. Now, according to the decision that has been made, notwithstanding the lands were thus withdrawn from market and the homesteaders acted upon the faith of this withdrawal and went outside of the lands that were thus withdrawn, and made their pre-emptions or their homesteads, when the line came to be located it was changed from the line contemplated originally, or that was proposed to be reached by the withdrawal of lands, and the consequence was that they sought to take, and do, if the decision now stands, take the pre-emptions and the homesteads thus made.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from New Jersey has spoken in regard to vested rights. I have as high regard for vested rights as any Senator, but it may depend something upon their character. The Supreme Court, I think, have said in one decision some years ago that there is no constitutional inhibition upon Congress to divest what is called a vested right. Suppose it should be held by the court, as a construction of the law, that when the railroad company does make its selection the title will relate back and date from that time, although nobody in the world had any knowledge of it; here is a vested right, if you please, that is a mere technicality. It has no sacredness about it; it is in violation of equity. Suppose, if you please, the courts should hold that after the railroad company had selected its land the title dated back from the passage of the grant made by Congress. That would be a great wrong. You might call it a vested right, but it would be a vested wrong. It would be a vested wrong rather than a vested right. Or suppose it should be held by the courts that when the directors of the railroad company met, if you please, at the Tremont House, in Chicago, and adopted a particular route and nobody knew anything about it in the world except the directors of that company and the actual settlers could not get notice for three months afterward, still the company's title dated from that action in the hotel in Chicago. There you may say is a vested right, but it is an absolute wrong. For such a vested right I certainly would have no very high regard.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I put a question to my friend from Indiana? Let him change his case a little. Suppose that the railroad company, by an absolute grant from the Government of the United States, had a grant of land that took effect in præsenti, which is the "vested wrong" that he speaks of, and the company mortgaged it, and the bonds were held all over the country by parties who had actually paid their money on that security, would it be a vested wrong then for the Government to live up to the agreement?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir. I think I can answer that very satisfactorily.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose there is hardly one of these railroad companies that is not in that situation. If my friend will permit me, as I have involuntarily got into this debate—for I never read the bill until it came here and have no particular friendship for railroad companies—I feel bound to say, in consequence of a remark which fell from one of the friends of this bill, that the railroad companies had their advocates on this floor——

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will pardon me, as I made that remark, I will say that I certainly had no allusion to any Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very happy to hear my friend say so, and that I have afforded him an opportunity to make the disclaimer.

Mr. MORTON. I think I can answer the argument of my friend from New Jersey. He puts this question: Suppose Congress makes a grant of land to an existing corporation, to take effect in præsenti, —that is, to-day, or as soon as the bill is approved—and the company mortgages the land to secure its bonds? I say there is a vested right, and the country is bound to take legal notice of the passage of that bill, and when the actual settler goes to the land office and inquires of the register what lands are open to entry he will be told by that officer, if he does his duty, that such and such lands have been granted by Congress, and are not open to entry. Now, that is not the case here at all. The case here is just the opposite. There is no grant in præsenti. The title in the land does not pass to the railroad company at once, but it only passes after the company has complied with certain conditions prescribed by law, one of which is that the company shall designate the route that it is going to run upon, have a survey made, and file the survey in the General Land Office at Washington; and after it has filed the survey and located the road, and occupation has been given, then the Government shall withdraw those lands from market; and the title does not vest, in my judgment, until those lands have been withdrawn from the market. That is a very different case from the one put by my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. Suppose, under a given state of facts, under the facts as presented by this bill, for instance, the courts should hold, provided they have an opportunity to pass upon the question, that a railroad company had a vested right to these lands from the date of the filing of the survey, that the title vested then, and not from the date of the notice of the withdrawal in the local land office. Suppose that were true, then the question which I desire to put is this: Can we by any legislation take away that right? I put this question, not because I am opposed to the bill, for I want to vote for it, and I think I shall. I think, however, there are difficulties in this bill, and very grave ones, as was suggested by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MORTON. I will say in answer to my friend from Oregon that so far as the question of power is concerned I think there is no doubt about it. As to the cases in which Congress would be justified in divesting what may be called a vested right, there would be different opinions. I should say it would be only in an extreme case where the vested right is the result of a technical construction of law which operates in defiance of equity. If the title passes from the Government to the railroad company by the simple act of their filing a map here of which the people in the country can have no knowledge whatever, or if the title passes as soon as the act of Congress is approved, that is a very different case, and takes it out of the operation of the principle. But where the title of the company depends upon the performance of certain conditions subsequent, it seems to me the true principle of law is that the title does not vest in the company until those conditions have been complied with, and the most material condition is that the Government itself shall have withdrawn the lands from the market; because so long as those lands remain open to entry upon the books of the land office, and the officer of the Government is bound to so say to the inquirer, just so long a valid title can be acquired by the actual settler, in my judgment.

So much for the first section of the bill. Now I come to the second section:

SEC. 2. That when at the time of such withdrawal as aforesaid valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned, and under the decisions and rulings of the Land Department were re-entered by pre-emption or homestead claimants who have complied with the laws governing pre-emption or homestead entries, or shall make the proper proofs required under such laws, such entries shall be deemed valid, and patents shall issue therefor to the person entitled thereto.

Where the entry has been made before notice given, and it is a valid entry, but is afterward abandoned from any cause, and if in such a case under the rulings and practice of the Land Office the lands may be re-entered by another actual settler, which often occurs, then the title of the last shall not be divested by the railroad company. I can see no objection to that provided the first section is right.

I come now to the only clause of this bill—and I call the attention of my friend from Kansas—to which I take any exception, and that is in the third section, and I do not know that there is any objection to that really; but I wish to call attention to the third section:

SEC. 3. That all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant, or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant, shall be deemed valid, and a compliance with the laws and the making of the proof required shall entitle the holder of such claim to a patent therefor.

This is where an entry has been made on lands that have been granted, but where the time fixed for the taking effect of the grant has expired. Then the lands are again put into the market, and they are open to entry. If the time is subsequently extended by Congress, that subsequent extension shall not have the effect to divest the title of an actual settler who entered upon the land after the expiration of the first grant and before the second one was made. Is that the case?

Mr. INGALLS. That is the theory of the law.

Mr. BOGY. That is not the part of the law the Senator from Indiana is arguing upon. That does not speak of extension. I am in favor of a bill of this kind, but it strikes me that the third section amounts to nothing at all in its present condition. The Senator's argument is very proper, but I think the bill is defective. The way the third section stands it really amounts to nothing at all, because it provides for cases where persons have made entry on lands the title to which has not been perfected by the railroad company. In such cases the settler's title is good now without any additional legislation at all. There is no question about that.

Mr. MORTON. The phrase "extension" is not in the section, but I suppose it refers to that unquestionably.

Mr. BOGY. I think it ought to be so. The Senator's views are correct.

Mr. MORTON. It speaks of an entry of land after the expiration of the grant. The grant has expired by its own limitation, as I understand; then the actual settler goes upon it. Congress has in a number of cases since I have been here extended the time after the grant was forfeited by failure to comply within the time.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator think in that case that the railroad company ought to take the title away from the settler who has made a valid entry in that interim?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir, I think it ought not; and that is the reason I approve of the bill in that particular.

Mr. INGALLS. That is my view also.

Mr. MORTON. Now I come to the clause upon which I have a little question:

Or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant.

A grant has been made upon certain conditions, and there may be a default in some of them, there may be a technical forfeiture or a technical violation of the conditions of the grant. I would not say that such lands should be open to entry.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will permit me, I think that this is after all merely a superfluous clause, and upon further thought it has occurred to me that the clause in lines 5, 6, and 7, "or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant," ought to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. MORTON. With that exception I think the bill is right.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in support of the bill, because the people of Oregon as well as those of Kansas and Nebraska are interested in the provisions of it. And perhaps I had better refer to certain facts to illustrate the hardships on the part of the settlers and the necessity of legislation in their behalf. I will refer more particularly to the Northern Pacific Railway grant and to those who have settled on lands within the limits of the grant made to that company, because I am more familiar with those cases than with those arising under the grants to the Central and the Union Pacific Railroads.

With respect to the Northern Pacific Railway Company, I will say that it was incorporated by act of Congress on the 2d day of July, 1864. It did nothing toward designating its general route until the 13th day of August, 1870. On that day it filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior the map of its general route, which of course was prepared, in all probability, in the office of the company in New York. It was filed on that day—the 13th of August, 1870—in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BOGY. The map of the entire route from east to west?

Mr. KELLY. For the entire route, from the east to the west, from Minnesota to Washington Territory. Of course the settlers knew nothing of the day when that was filed. They went on, as before, locating upon lands, taking pre-emption claims and homestead claims. It was the ruling of the local land officers and the ruling of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that until the lands were withdrawn from pre-emption and homestead claims by notice in the local land offices any one could take pre-emption and homestead claims. That was a general understanding; and I know of many settlers who went upon the public lands on that line between the 13th day of August, 1870, and some time in the summer of 1872, when the withdrawal was noted in the local land offices and notice given to the registers and receivers that the lands were withdrawn from sale and entry. In the mean time, between 1870 and 1872, settlers made great improvements upon these lands. They went upon them in good faith; their entries were recognized by the local land officers; the register received declaratory statements in pre-emption claims and notifications in homestead entries. Then a controversy arose between the railroad company and these settlers, the railroad company claiming that their right commenced from the time they filed the map of their general route in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. The Commissioner of the General Land Office decided in favor of the settlers and against the railroad company. From that decision an appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Interior, and a decision was rendered by him on the 15th of March, 1873. Secretary Delano gave the reasons why the railroad company had precedence over the settlers between those dates, reversing the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that Commissioner then instructed all the local land officers to cancel the entries which had been made in good faith by settlers, and where they had paid for the lands to return them their money. Many of the settlers had made valuable improvements on the lands, and were unwilling to give them up and take a return of their money, and they are contesting to this day as against the rights of the railroad company.

Let me here say that the railroad company has had the title adjudged to it by the Secretary of the Interior, not by any court of justice. No court has decided in its favor, at least none that I have heard of. I do not think the question has ever been decided in any court, but it has been decided by the Secretary of the Interior reversing the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Here, then, is the question presented: who is entitled to these lands? The case has not, as I said, been adjudged by any court. The Commissioner decided in favor of the settler, the Secretary of the Interior has reversed him and decided in favor of the railroad company, but no patent has been issued. Here is the simple question presented to us: who ought to have the patent? The railroad company does not care about the legal muniment of title, because it is sufficient for them to claim under the grant; they are in possession by the ruling of the Secretary of the Interior. If the settlers claim that they are entitled to it they have no means of asserting their rights, because the Secretary of the Interior instructed the Commissioner of the General Land Office to notify the local land officers that he would cause their notification to be canceled, and so they have no standing in court.

I undertake to say that it is simply just and right that we should place them in such a position that they can go into the courts and assert their rights as against the railroad companies. The bill simply authorizes them to present the case for adjudication in the courts, the courts not having decided it at all. If the settlers get the patent and the railroad company chooses to controvert it, let it do so. Is it not quite as well that they should have a patent in the first instance and let the railroad company controvert it as to give the patent to the company and let the settlers have no standing whatever in court?

Again, it can harm no one, because this is not a new case by any means. If the United States has made a grant of these lands already, it simply places the case where it can be adjudged by the courts, and in many an instance land has been granted two or three times, and in that case the older grant always prevails. So then if the patents be given to the settlers, if their titles be confirmed to them so far as the United States is concerned, the railroad company may claim and may assert its right as against the settlers when an ejectment is brought, if it be brought by the settlers against them. So that in my judgment we are simply presenting a case for adjudication in the courts, and the bill merely enables these settlers who now have no standing in court to go there and assert their rights; and that is nothing but just.

I might say a few words, too, in support of the second section which was referred to by the Senator from California. When a settler has made valuable improvements on a tract of land, but has not procured title to it, and he chooses to sell that land, this bill authorizes his vendee to perfect his right as against the railroad company, and I think he ought to be permitted to do it for this reason: Suppose that settler were on the land before Congress granted it to the railroad company——

Mr. BOGY. Allow me to ask the Senator does the second section provide in the way the Senator thinks, that the vendee shall have title to the land? My objection to the second section is that it does not so provide. I think that was the intention, but I think it has failed to do so, and that is my objection to it.

Mr. SARGENT. Under the construction of the General Land Office, it would reach it.

Mr. BOGY. I think not. I think the second section as worded does not protect the right in that case. I am in favor of the principle.

Mr. SARGENT. They treat the sale and delivery of possession by the first party as an abandonment, and the second section would date title from the time of the vendee taking possession.

Mr. KELLY. According to my understanding of the rulings of the Land Office, heretofore where a grant was made of land to a railroad company, and any person was in possession at the time, it was not to be construed as granting that land to the company. The late rulings of the Land Office have reversed that understanding, and it is held now that when the first occupant abandons the tract, then the right of the railroad company attaches. I do not think that it was the intention of Congress to grant any lands that were held adversely at the time of the original grant, and this section simply authorizes these persons to be placed in a situation where they can contest their rights with the railroad companies.

If there had been a decision of a judicial tribunal that the companies were entitled to these lands, then I would with great reluctance, if at all vote for this bill; indeed, I do not think I could vote for it at all if it was adjudged by a court that these lands really belonged to the railroad companies. However unfortunate it might be to the settlers, it would have so to remain. But, as I said before, this case has never been presented to a court; it has simply been decided by the Secretary of the Interior, an officer who is not authorized, under our system of government, to decide the conflicting claims of different persons. Such matters are to be adjudged by the courts, and, as I said, no judicial decision having been made, but only that of an executive officer of the Government, it strikes me that it is right and proper that the patent should issue to these settlers, and that they should be placed in a situation where their rights can be adjudged by the courts.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I am in favor of the main features of this bill; yet, according to my interpretation of the bill, it does not attain the object which it aims to attain. Whether a grant to a railroad company is effectual until the railroad is located and the lands have been withdrawn has been a matter of controversy in my section of the country for some years; but it was pretty well settled for many years, and in accordance with that settlement we went on without much trouble as between the pre-emptors and homesteaders and the railroads. Until the decision made by the late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Delano, it was conceded that any location made in pursuance of law within the lands granted to a railroad company, (ten or twenty miles on each side of the road, as is the case with most of these grants,) before a survey had been made of the line of that road and filed with the Secretary of the Interior, and the lands had been withdrawn by order of the Land Department, was good, and the parties received their patents. The question whether that was in accordance with strict law or not—that is whether the grant was effectual at the time the act of Congress passed, and vested that land in the railroad company, which would be a grant in præsenti of land which was to be selected in futuro—did not arise. Practically the settler obtained his patent, and it was enough for his protection.

Since that decision has been made the settlers have no protection at all; they have no means of asserting their rights. They make a location before the lands are withdrawn; but it being within the line, within the ten or twenty miles designated by law, under the decision of the Secretary of the Interior they have no evidence of right whatever, and therefore have no means of asserting any rights in any form. The object of the first portion of the first section of this bill, if I understand it, is to protect parties thus situated who have in good faith made settlements before the lands were withdrawn from market, but as a matter of course after the law was passed granting the lands, and to provide that in that case the Land Department shall recognize the rights of those people by giving to them a patent. That is the only effect of the first portion of the first section of the bill. The legal question will still remain.

Mr. MERRIMON. Does the statute make it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to pass judgment in such cases?

Mr. BOGY. There is no provision in hæc verba that it shall be his duty, but it is a part of his administrative duties to pass upon these questions as they come up in the course of business, and he cannot avoid it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I understood it to be intimated in debate a moment ago that the statute charged the Secretary of the Interior with the duty of making this decision. Then he was a judge pro tanto, and it was competent for him to make the decision.

Mr. BOGY. I will reply to my friend from North Carolina that the law does not make it his duty in so many words. It is only part of the general duties of the office to decide these questions as they come up. He issues a patent to the person who he thinks ought to have the title.

The first section speaks of "all pre-emption and homestead entries"—and they ought to be put on the same footing—"or entries in compliance with any law of the United States." The exact and precise meaning of these comprehensive words I will not attempt to explain now, but I am satisfied with them because no great harm can result from them; for if it be true that an entry has been made in compliance with any law of the United States, whether that law be a pre-emption law or a homestead law, if in good faith a settler has made an entry in compliance with any law of the United States on land prior to the withdrawal of that land from market, he should be entitled to a patent, he should be recognized as the legal owner of that land. That I favor; that is right, beyond a doubt; and that law becomes a necessity to overrule what I conceive to be a most erroneous decision of the late Secretary of the Interior. I say so without intending any reflection on that officer. I have no such intention, but I think he was mistaken, and it was in conflict with the rulings of his predecessors, perhaps from the very beginning of railroad grants. Therefore I am in favor of that portion of the first section of this bill, protecting a person who thus makes a location either as a pre-emptor or under the homestead law or in virtue of any other law that may exist. I do not know of any other myself, but there may be, as I do not know all the laws. That was right originally and it is right now, because it overrules to that extent the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, and ultimately this question perhaps will go to the courts; because, if it be true that the railroad grant has vested in the railroad company a title, we cannot divest that title by any legislation that we may adopt here, and some one case will be tried that will settle all these cases; but as it is now that one case cannot arise because these parties have no means of asserting their title; they have no evidence of title, have no standing in court, and cannot get there.

One of the great troubles in regard to all our railroad land grants arises as to the time when the withdrawal shall be made. I find no fault with the railroad directors sitting in their parlors in Chicago or in Boston or anywhere else and making a designation of their route. That is right; they ought to do it. I base nothing on any such argument. It is a popular argument, I know; but as I am not a candidate, as most of my friends on this floor are, for the Presidency, I am willing to be very candid. [Laughter.] The lines are surveyed by engineers, and when the survey is made, as a matter of necessity it is returned back to the board of directors, whether they are in session in Boston or in New York or in Chicago. I think they might sit in a much better place—Saint Louis; but that place has not been mentioned before us. A return is made to that board of directors; the board of directors then file the survey of their line thus made with the Land Department, and there the ability to do anything further is at an end as far as the railroad is concerned. Now it becomes the duty of the Land Office to withdraw those lands from market. The trouble has been that for some reason or other that duty has been very much neglected. What the reason has been I do not know; but the fact is, as I state, that after the surveys have been filed with the Land Office here, after the line has been adopted by these boards, sit where they may, and they have complied with the law and have filed their line of survey in the Land Office here, yet the Land Department or the Land Bureau, for some reason with which I am not acquainted, has often neglected to withdraw those lands. Now, it should be a portion of this bill to make it the duty of the Land Office immediately on the receipt of a line of railroad being designated in accordance with the terms of the law giving it a land grant to withdraw the lands within the line prescribed by the law granting it those lands. It can be made the duty of the officers now to do it. Some of the lands have not yet perhaps all been surveyed. It was the object of my inquiry a while ago to ascertain that, because I was not aware that the entire line had been located from east to west on the Northern Pacific route; but there has been the trouble. The trouble has been that after the line was thus surveyed by the engineers of the railroad and the map filed in the Land Office here parties, knowing exactly where the railroad would go and believing that the building of the railroad would make the lands near to it very valuable, have gone on immediately and located pre-emptions and homesteads within the ten or twenty miles, as the law might designate, getting their information here, knowing that the line was located, and until the ruling of the late

Secretary those parties were protected. Whether they ought to have been protected or not is neither here nor there; they were protected until the land was withdrawn. The Land Office ought to have withdrawn it immediately; but it was not withdrawn immediately. Sometimes it remained one year and sometimes two years, and in my State I think in one case upward of three years.

As there will be no more land grants, perhaps it may not be very important to pass on that subject; but I am in favor of a law now by which you will give the patents to the parties who made these locations before the withdrawal of the lands from market. I have myself no doubt of the law. As a practicing lawyer in my own State many years ago I had occasion to investigate the matter with some care; although it was a grant, to use technical terms, in præsenti, it was to take effect in futuro, upon the arising of certain contingencies; that is, a line had to be surveyed; that line had to be adopted by the railroad company; it had then to be returned to the Land Office, and the Land Office had to withdraw those lands from sale; and, until all these terms were complied with, we contended that the grant was not complete. I believe that to be good law, although it is in conflict with the decision of the late Secretary of the Interior.

Now, sir, I think I have said enough in regard to the first portion of the first section, because it has two very distinct provisions. It goes on to say that the locator shall be entitled to a patent if he made his location prior to the withdrawal of the lands:

Or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office, and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with, and proper proofs thereof have been made by the parties holding such tracts or parcels, they shall be confirmed, and patents for the same shall issue to the parties entitled thereto.

This last portion of the first section strikes me as entire surplusage. I can see no legal effect in it whatever. That is the law now. If a person makes a location in accordance with the pre-emption law or the homestead law, or in compliance with any law of the United States, upon land of the United States which was designated as railroad land, but which the railroad company abandoned, and that land has thereby become restored to the United States, why as a matter of course——

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. BOGY. Let me finish my sentence. As a matter of course that man's right is complete. Why should it not be?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would inquire if, in a case of that kind, it does not require, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, either legislative or judicial action in order to determine that question?

Mr. BOGY. I am not aware of any such decision of the Supreme Court. I do not pretend to know all the decisions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would call the attention of the Senate to the decision in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wallace, page 44.

Mr. BOGY. Please read.

Mr. MITCHELL. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

First. That the act of June 3, 1856, and the first section of the act of May 5, 1864, are grants in præsenti, and passed the title to the odd sections designated to be afterward located; when the route was fixed their location became certain, and the title, which was previously imperfect, acquired precision and became attached to the land.

Second. That the lands granted have not reverted to the United States, although the road was not constructed within the period prescribed, no action having been taken either by legislation or judicial proceedings to enforce a forfeiture of the grants.

Judge Field in announcing the decision——

Mr. BOGY. I am very familiar with that decision, and I will save the Senator the trouble of further reading.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to read one sentence, because it is directly in conflict with the remarks which are being made by the Senator, as I understand him.

Mr. BOGY. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. Judge Field says:

And it is settled law that no one can take advantage of the non-performance of a condition-subsequent annexed to an estate in fee, but the grantor or his heirs or the successors of the grantor if the grant proceed from an artificial person; and if they do not see fit to assert their right to enforce a forfeiture on that ground, the title remains unimpaired in the grantee. The authorities on this point, with hardly an exception, are all one way from the Year Books down. And the same doctrine obtains where the grant upon condition proceeds from the Government; no individual can assail the title it has conveyed on the ground that the grantee has failed to perform the conditions annexed.

In what manner the reserved right of the grantor for breach of the condition must be asserted so as to restore the estate depends upon the character of the grant. If it be a private grant, that right must be asserted by entry or its equivalent. If the grant be a public one, it must be asserted by judicial proceeding authorized by law, the equivalent of an inquest of office at common law, finding the fact of forfeiture and adjudging the restoration of the estate on that ground, or there must be some legislative assertion of ownership of the property for breach of the condition, such as an act directing the possession and appropriation of the property, or that it be offered for sale or settlement.

Mr. BOGY. As I understand that decision, it is simply this: that these grants to railroads are, as far as the mere abstract idea of title is concerned, complete and perfect; but like all land legislation, as a matter of necessity the title must attach to some particular locality. It is a grant in præsenti to take effect in futuro as far as the mere question of locality is concerned. The court decides that, it being a grant complete, the title did not revert back to the United States by operation of law, although the time within which the road should have been finished had expired, but that it required legislation to divest the title of the railroad company. That it was competent for Congress to put an end to the grant because the terms of the grant had not been complied with is beyond a doubt in accordance with that decision, but it required action of Congress, and until action had taken place——

Mr. MITCHELL. That is just what is proposed by this bill.

Mr. BOGY. Pardon me. And until action had taken place the grant remained perfect. Indeed, many of the companies—I could cite them—have not now built their roads within the years prescribed in the law, but they contend that according to the very decision of the Supreme Court there is no limitation applicable to them until there is positive action on the part of Congress.

Mr. HOWE. I do not wish to interrogate the Senator from Missouri, but I wish to interrogate the Senator from Oregon, and to know whether it be the purpose of the words upon which the Senator is now commenting to clothe the Commissioner of the General Land Office with authority to declare forfeited a grant which has been made by the Government upon his judgment that the condition has not been complied with?

Mr. BOGY. The Senator from Wisconsin is perfectly right, and it is the point that I was aiming to get at; but he, being a younger man, is more ardent and has got to it before I did. [Laughter.] Now, according to my understanding and the understanding of my friend from Wisconsin, the grant being perfect, is it the intention of this section to clothe the Secretary of the Interior with the power of ending that grant—that is the idea—by doing what? By restoring the land to the public domain. Now, although a law of that kind might be a very good law, and might receive my support, (I cannot say as to that,) I think this bill does not effect that object. It says, "or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with" the party shall be entitled to his patent. It would leave the case in a more befogged condition than it is now, because if you did give the pre-emptor under this second portion of the first section a title the question would still arise, was not the railroad company entitled to that land until the grant had been forfeited by act of Congress? and you would have made no progress in protecting these people in the West. It is my desire and intention to protect them if I can, but I do not think this bill does protect them. I do not think that this second portion of the first section attains that end, although I am very free to say it is plain that is the object aimed to be accomplished, but I think this does not accomplish it. It does not change the right. The very decision of the Supreme Court read by my friend from Oregon sustains me and is in opposition to the views taken by him.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think myself the section ought to go further.

Mr. BOGY. Because, if it be true that this is a grant in præsenti, according to all the notions of law we have, it is complete, it is perfect, and no legislation here can divest that grant. If it be a complete grant we cannot divest it by any legislation, and we involve these homesteaders and pre-emptors in more litigation than would be profitable to them, which I desire to avoid. Therefore, I think the section is imperfect, and does not attain the object aimed to be accomplished by my friends. Hence, although I am in favor of the idea, which, as far as I can catch it, is embodied in the section, I suggest that the section ought to be improved by amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Wisconsin to what I believe to be the fact in this matter. I suppose neither of them would deny that, where a grant is made even in præsenti upon conditions, the Government being a party to that grant has a right, on the entire failure of the conditions or a substantial failure of the conditions, to revoke the grant, to declare a forfeiture; and that perhaps we could do in this bill, or by any bill; and especially should we do so in case the rights of other parties had grown up by the action of the Government.

Now, I understand the fact to be that before this decision of the Supreme Court, where a railroad company totally failed to perform the conditions of its grant, did not build its road, but held a sort of cloud on public lands, impeding settlers and impeding settlement, the Land Office, acting on what it supposed to be its authority, declared in all such cases that, on account of the failure of the companies to perform their duty, the land had reverted to the General Government. Settlers and the people of the United States had a right to suppose that this action was in good faith and was legal. They are not of course all lawyers; they have not the advantage of sitting here and listening to these discussions; but they saw a public declaration, which they knew to be founded on fact, that a land grant had not been complied with and that certain land was restored to the public domain and was open to homestead and pre-emption. They thereupon in perfect good faith entered upon such land, took up the moderate quantities to which they were entitled, in many cases paid for their land, in all cases probably made valuable improvements. Subsequently Congress, on the suggestion of these railroad companies, with the inducements which they can bring to bear on committees, with the arguments which they can address to Senators' minds, &c., convinced Congress that it would be a very good thing to have the railroad built anyhow, and therefore got a re-grant of the land, or, in other words, got an extension of the grant. Then the Land Office turned around and said, "Congress having extended this grant, it cuts out all the men who came in as settlers during the intervening period." This former grant and the subsequent one are like a pair of shears, and cut to pieces those who get between them.

This bill provides that where there has been a forfeiture and the land has been declared restored to the public domain by the Land Office—and I believe there are not a great many cases of the kind—persons who were thus encouraged by the Land Office, our officers, to so proceed, and whose cases were overlooked by Congress when it made the extension, shall have the privilege of enjoying the lands which they paid the Government for. It seems to me that is a plain and wise provision, and that the railroad companies, who were in default year after year and who came and begged Congress that they might have the residue of the lands, ought not to take the land which belonged to these settlers. I make that suggestion of fact to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. BOGY. My friend's declaration only confirms me in the position I tried to explain before. Nobody doubts, the Supreme Court does not doubt, no lawyer can doubt, no man who is at all familiar with the laws applicable to this subject can doubt, that it is competent for Congress to end a grant when the terms of the grant have not been complied with. For instance, lands are given to a railroad company provided the railroad is finished between the two termini in ten years, and it is not finished or even there is no commencement at all made during the whole ten years; according to the decision of the Supreme Court, and I think it is good law, although the terms have not been complied with, it is a grant in præsenti and the title is in that railroad company; but as those terms have not been complied with it is competent for the United States, representing the other party to the contract, to end that contract. It is the same rule of law that regulates the transactions between man and man. There is no difference. That decision only carries out what we all know to be the law.

I caught the idea of my friend from Wisconsin, and he and I agree that this does not provide a sufficient remedy by which the rights of these railroads are terminated so as to enable the pre-emptor to come in with his right. That is my difficulty, and it is for that reason that I object to the language as it is. I agree with the objects aimed to be accomplished; I agree with the speech made by my friend from California; I agree with the speech made by my friend from Oregon; but that does not prove that this bill is right in its wording by any means. The Senator from Indiana a while ago made a speech with every word of which I agree; but it was entirely beyond the bill; it applied to no part of the bill. I want a bill to be effectual to carry out the views of these gentlemen; and I say this bill does not do it.

Now, with regard to the second section I think we are more embarrassed there than in the first, and I think the embarrassments in the first section are very great. That second section provides:

At the time the lands were withdrawn, mind you, valid pre-emption or homestead rights existed according to law, and they being in existence according to law the railroad company as a matter of course could have no sort of claim to that same land. That is all true; but if A is a pre-emptor and has in accordance with the law obtained a pre-emption on land that has been given to a railroad but before it has been withdrawn from sale, and he afterward "abandons" that land—this is the word used—can Congress grant that land to anybody else who may comply with the pre-emption laws? Why not, my friend from California asks me? For the reason that instantaneously when the right of one ceases the other right comes into existence; immediately as one disappears the other comes there full armed and equipped, and his title is as perfect as if he had held it a thousand years.

Mr. SARGENT. Will my friend allow me to read a section; and it will show him, I think, that he is mistaken? I will take the grant to the Union Pacific Railroad, which is a good type of all of them.

Mr. BOGY. I am willing to be corrected.

Mr. SARGENT. The grant is to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of the railroad, afterward increased to ten—on the line thereof, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed.

Now, let me ask my friend, if a homestead or pre-emption has attached at the time of the definite location, is not the land covered by that removed from the grant, and what words of grant are there subsequently by which that, in case of abandonment, goes to the railroad company? It obviously is territory which is reserved by the United States from the operation of the grant. It is for the benefit of the pre-emptor. If the pre-emptor abandons it or does not make his title good to it, it remains in the Government of the United States to be sold and the money put in the Treasury, or to be granted to whomever it pleases. But the act does not say that in case this pre-emption existing at that time is abandoned then the rights of the railroad company shall instantly adhere thereto. It simply says that it is reserved from the grant.

Mr. BOGY. As a lawyer, I would say all that which my friend from California has read is totally null and void, and might as well not be in the law, and the law would have the same effect. It amounts to nothing at all. It is mere verbiage.

That there be, and is hereby, granted to the said company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores thereon, every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad, on the line thereof, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road, not sold—

What is the use of putting "not sold" there? If the land had been sold, could the Government grant it? As a matter of course if it was sold the Government could not grant it—reserved—

If it be reserved, it is reserved in accordance with law, not an arbitrary reservation; and if it be reserved in pursuance of law, (and there is no way in the world to reserve it but according to law,) it cannot be granted. It is true there are Indian reservations made by executive order, but that has been decided by the Supreme Court to be no reservation at all as against a railroad. I know that decision—reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached.

If a pre-emption right has attached, the Government with all its power, backed by forty millions of people, cannot take that pre-emptor's right away from him as long as the Supreme Court of the United States maintains the character it has now. Nor was it competent for the Government of the United States, with all its Army and power, to deprive a homestead-man who settled upon the wilds of the West of any right which existed there before this law was passed. There is no such authority in this Government, with all its immense power; and all that language is mere surplusage; it amounts to nothing.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask my friend if he considers that that was merely a reservation in favor of the pre-emptor, or if it was not also a reservation of the land to which a pre-emption may have attached? If it was a reservation of the land, then of course there must be a reservation.

Mr. BOGY. No. We are coming perhaps to this subject with the intention of benefiting these parties by different lines. I am talking of the effect of the grant. It is not competent for the Government of the United States more than it is for an individual to grant that which it does not possess. It reminds me of an anecdote of a Methodist preacher, who preached a sermon once, and some one who had listened to him complained to him that he had made a very poor sermon indeed. "Well," he said, "my dear fellow, I presume that is true; but don't you know that it is the most difficult thing in the world to convey to others ideas which we are not possessed of ourselves." It would be the most difficult thing in the world for the Government to convey to others that which it did not own: and if this land had been sold, or a right had been secured to a pre-emptor, or a right had been secured to a homesteader, then, according to the law, there was no power in this Government to take it away.

Mr. HARVEY. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not know that an inchoate right under the pre-emption or homestead law leaves a right of reversion to the Government in case of abandonment. The argument of the Senator is simply this: that, instead of the abandonment of a claim operating as a reversion to the Government, it operates as a grant to the railroad, when the law under which the railroad claims expressly excludes that very particular land.

Mr. BOGY. I am unable to understand the point yet. The land is excluded I admit, but the land would have been excluded without these words in the law just as effectually. The rights are not changed because this law says, We grant you, Mr. Railroad Company, a certain quantity of lands, provided we have not sold those lands before; provided that nobody has proven his pre-emption in accordance with law to those lands. If he had, it was not competent for Congress to divest that man of his pre-emption right. Or "provided there be no homesteader on the grant;" if there was one, it was not competent for Congress to deprive him. But my friend from Kansas says these rights may be inchoate. I say these rights are not inchoate; they are complete; but although complete they are made upon conditions; and those conditions must be complied with. As an abstract question the right is not taken away; it is perfect and complete; and it is what the law calls a vested right.

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator will see that this section is dealing with these conditions; and the provision is simply this:

That when, at the time of such withdrawal as aforesaid, valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned.

That is, the conditions were not complied with. The claimant then has an inchoate right, as I have said, which fails by not complying with the conditions. The Senator from Missouri argues that by reason of that failure the land is included in the grant to the railroad company, while we claim that it reverts to the Government.

Mr. BOGY. I understand my friend perfectly well.

Mr. HARVEY. Unless he means to claim that instead of reverting to the Government the land, upon abandonment of the settler, became included in the grant to the railroad, I can see no point in his objection to this section.

Mr. BOGY. It is just what I contend is the law in spite of what I desire to be the law. I am for the pre-emptor; I am for the homesteader; I want to protect them; but I say that under this bill, and coupling this bill with the act read by the Senator from California a while ago, which provided that Congress did not undertake to grant lands to these railroads which it had sold to other parties or upon which pre-emption or homestead had attached, the rights of the settlers are not clearly and properly protected as they ought to be. I believe a law ought to be passed by which these men shall be protected in spite of the railroads, but I do not think this does it because—and that is the point now—if A as a pre-emptor has a right to one hundred and sixty acres of land within the line of the railroad grant his right is perfectly complete, as far as the mere idea of right is concerned, but that right as it necessarily must be is coupled with conditions, as all homestead and pre-emption rights are. It is not worth while now to enumerate the conditions, such as residence, &c. He chooses not to comply with those conditions. However perfect his right was and however amply he might have protected himself by complying with the conditions, he chooses not to comply with them, but makes what is very properly called an abandonment. He abandons his land. Now what is the law? The very law read by the Senator from California says that if there be a pre-emption there it is not included. There is a pre-emption there, but that is inchoate; the right is not inchoate, but the pre-emption is inchoate, and it may be perfected in time; but he does not choose to perfect it; he gives it up, and instantaneously upon his abandonment the railroad's right comes in and it is railroad land.

Mr. HARVEY. Even though excluded by the very terms of the grant?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Missouri is well informed about the public lands, I perceive, and I should thank him to tell me at what time, whether before or after lands are surveyed, a right of pre-emption or a right of entry can be said to attach.

Mr. BOGY. I will answer the Senator. There have been different pre-emption laws at different periods. The present pre-emption law does not require that the land shall previously be surveyed. The condition must be complied with.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do I understand the Senator to say that under the present law any person may go on any of the public lands of the United States and make an entry, and carry it out to a title?

Mr. BOGY. I will answer the Senator. Strictly speaking, he may not do so under the pre-emption laws. He does that under the homestead law, or he can do it more effectually under the homestead law. His mere right is perfect under the pre-emption law, but he has to comply with the conditions of residence, proof, and all that. Therefore my objection to this section is not an objection to what my friend from Kansas [Mr. HARVEY] wishes the law to be——

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the objection to it is based upon a mistake as to the result of the abandonment by the settler. That result is not to include the land which he before occupied in the grant to the railroad company, because it is excluded by the act making the grant, but the fact is that by the abandonment the land reverts to the Government of the United States; and the object of this particular section is to protect the settler who has taken that land after its abandonment by the first settler, and taken it in pursuance of the rulings and regulations of the Land Department. That is the only aim of this section, as I understand, and I think it accomplishes that purpose. At any rate, the friends of the bill are ready to take it as it stands and risk the matter.

Mr. BOGY. I profess to be a friend to this bill, but I am not willing to take it as it stands.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senator from Missouri to give way to enable me to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BOGY. I have no objection.

Mr. PADDOCK. My reason is this: There are a number of Senators who wish to be heard on this question, and it is apparent to all that it is not possible to dispose of it to-day. Therefore I ask that it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 25, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REDMOND TULLEY.

Mr. O'BRIEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1560) for the relief of Redmond Tulley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ALABAMA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, presented papers in the contested-election case from the first district of Alabama, Bromberg vs. Haralson; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour commences at fifteen minutes past twelve, and the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee of Elections, reported papers in the following cases; which were received and ordered to be printed:

Papers in the case of Le Moyne vs. Farwell, of the third district of Illinois.

Papers in the case of Finley vs. Walls, from the second district of Florida.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN TRUST FUNDS.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1561) to transfer the custody of certain Indian trust funds from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasurer of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that all the stocks, bonds, and other securities or evidences of indebtedness now held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the benefit of certain Indian tribes shall, within thirty days from the passage of the act, be turned over to the Treasurer of the United States, to be by him held and disposed of in the same manner and upon the same trust as they have been heretofore held by the Secretary of the Interior, provided that nothing contained in the act shall operate to affect the guardianship and control now exercised by the Secretary of the Interior over any Indian or Indian tribes excepting as to his custody of the trust fund herein mentioned.

Mr. FOSTER. This bill relates wholly and solely to the custody of the Indian trust funds now held by the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior himself desires the transfer, and the committee believe that the Treasurer is the proper custodian of these funds.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

10 PER CENT. TAX ON BANKS.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 438) for the relief of banks and bankers;

A bill (H. R. No. 772) to repeal sections 3412 and 3413 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1145) to repeal sections 19, 20, and 21 of the act entitled "An act to amend existing custom laws," &c., approved February 8, 1875.

Mr. COX. These several bills propose to repeal the 10 per cent. tax on banks and banking associations which is now levied under existing statutes. The committee unanimously ask to be discharged from their further consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bills were severally laid on the table.

EZRA B. BARNETT.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Ezra B. Barnett, of Norwich, New York; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH W. M'CLURG.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 286) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg, of Camden County, Missouri; and the bill was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

TRANSPORTATION OF ARMY SUPPLIES.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely on House joint resolution No. 16, directing the Secretary of War to determine distances of transportation of Army supplies on routes 1 and 2 west of the Missouri River in 1864 and 1865, and the same was laid on the table.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL M. C. MEIGS.

Mr. TERRY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be respectfully requested to transmit to this House copies of the orders and instructions under which Quartermaster-General M. C. Meigs is acting during his absence from the United States.

The resolution was adopted.

TRANSFER OF MILITARY RESERVATIONS TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. TERRY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1562) for the transfer of certain military reservations to the Interior Department, and authorizing the sale of the same; which was read a first and second time with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1563) to re-organize the judiciary of the United States; and the substitute was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

H. GOLD RODGERS.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the claim of H. Gold Rodgers, formerly chargé d'affaires to Sardinia, reported the same back adversely, and it was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PENSION AND BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. JENKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 1340) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions and bounty lands.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that, except in cases of permanent specific disabilities, no increase of pension shall be allowed to commence prior to the date of the examining-surgeon's certificate establishing the same, made under the pending claim for increase; but the certificate or report of any biennial examination may be accepted as sufficient for the purpose of adjudicating any claim for increase within six months after the date of such examination, and the increase of such pension in such cases shall commence from the date of such biennial examination; and in this as well as all other cases the certificate of an examining surgeon or of a board of examining surgeons shall be subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The second section provides that in the administration of the pension law, whenever it shall appear that a higher order of proof cannot be obtained, evidence of cohabition and general recognition as husband and wife, or other evidence which would constitute proof of a marriage under the common law, may be accepted as sufficient to establish the fact of marriage.

The third section provides that from and after January 1, 1878, parol evidence alone shall not be sufficient to prove service for which any bounty-land warrant or certificate may be claimed; and no such warrant or certificate shall be allowed for any service not shown by record evidence; provided that where the service was performed by substitute the fact of such substitution may be shown by parol evidence.

The fourth section repeals so much of section 2444 of the Revised Statutes as declares bounty-land warrants to be "personal chattels."

The fifth section provides that no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any crime arising under the pension laws or bounty-land laws of the United States unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within five years next after the committing of such crime.

The sixth section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the foregoing provisions of this act.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the object of that paragraph concerning bounty-land warrants proposing to repeal the act making them personal property?

Mr. JENKS. The object is to make them realty, so as to prevent the possibility of the frauds that are now perpetrated.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I cannot understand how you can make a bounty-land warrant real estate. If made real estate, it is subject to widow's dower; and how do you propose to create a widow's dower on a chose in action, if I may so call it, a floating warrant, which has no location any where? It seems to me impossible. You cannot make any thing but personal property out of it.

Mr. JENKS. Prior to the passage of the act which is embodied in the Revised Statutes, section 2404, the courts of the United States had decided these land-warrants to be realty; but by this section which we propose to repeal they were changed from realty to personalty. And widow's dower is not a necessary incident of all real estate, either by the laws of Pennsylvania or elsewhere. If this bill be passed, these bounty-land warrants cannot be disposed of to the detriment of the widow or heirs, until they shall have had notice. So long as these warrants are treated as personalty, they may be sent to a foreign state, letters of administration may be taken out there upon the claim that there are assets in that state; and without notice to the widow or heirs, the warrants are transferred and the title to the land is perfect. Thus those who ought to have the benefit of the land warrant are entirely defrauded. Hence we think this bill ought to be passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. If these land-warrants are treated as real estate innumerable difficulties will arise. By the laws of inheritance they will have to go in cases of intestacy to the heir, and not to the legal representative. A great deal of trouble will be caused in the administration of the estates of decedents who may have owned these land warrants. I trust the gentleman will consent to strike out that part of the bill relating to this matter, so that these warrants may remain as they now are, personal property.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for any amendment?

Mr. JENKS. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The question is then on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. As the bill cannot be amended, I hope it will not pass.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] whether this bill extends the limitation of time within which criminal indictments may be found in the cases mentioned in the bill?

Mr. JENKS. The present limitation is only two years; this bill proposes to make it five years—a necessary change, because often frauds in these matters cannot be detected within two years.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. This is all right.

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to propound an interrogatory to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in relation to the construction of the bill which he has reported. If my recollection is not at fault the bill provides that no evidence except record evidence shall be sufficient to entitle the applicant to a pension. I think such a rule is too stringent. In cases of loss, suppression, spoliation, or destruction of the record evidence I think there ought to be an opening in the law for the admission of secondary evidence. I therefore suggest to the gentleman this amendment, to come in at the proper place:

Except in cases where the record evidence may be lost or destroyed, so that the same cannot be produced.

Mr. JENKS. There is nothing in this bill relating to that subject. This only refers to bounty-land warrants. It is provided that unless a party shall before the 1st of January, 1878, establish his right to a bounty-land warrant he must after that produce a record showing the fact that he was mustered in and mustered out; and even this requirement applies only to soldiers of the war with Mexico.

Mr. BRIGHT. Still I think the reason of the rule is the same. Therefore I suggest to the gentleman the amendment I have just read.

Mr. JENKS. There must be some period fixed so that these claims for bounty-land warrants may be settled with certainty. The bill allows until January 1, 1878, to establish by parol evidence the right to these bounty-land warrants. At that time it will have been thirty-one years since the service of the soldier. The uncertainty of memory after the lapse of so many years, during which warrants may have been duplicated and reduplicated for the same soldier upon proof by different witnesses, makes it necessary that some time should be fixed after which record evidence shall be required. By this bill we still allow the soldier about two years within which to establish his claim by parol evidence; and if there are any bona fide cases still to be presented they ought to be proved during that time. The Commissioner of Pensions says that of those now granted there is reason to suppose that a very large proportion are fraudulent or duplicates of those previously granted. We think that the bill allows ample time for those who have just claims to come in and prove their cases by parol evidence. After that let them stand or fall by the record.

Mr. BRIGHT. With the permission of the gentleman, it seems to me that he misapprehends the suggestion I make. I do not propose to amend that part of the bill which relates to the requirement of record evidence. The suggestion I make has relation only to that class of cases, and it is an exception where the record evidence is destroyed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read in extenso.

Mr. FORT. Is the bill open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the bill has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FORT. I hope by common consent the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow it to be amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot do it—the House alone can do it by unanimous consent.

Mr. FORT. I wish to propose an amendment in line 4, section 4, so that all land warrants hereafter may be located in name of and by the heirs of the owners.

Mr. JENKS. If the land warrant is realty, the law directs that it shall be located in that way.

Mr. FORT. That is not as I understand it, but that the land warrant has to be sold. I think the heirs should be permitted to locate it.

Mr. JENKS. This bill changes the law as it is at present. Land warrants are now personal chattels, so that the administrator has to sell; but when they become realty, as is provided for in this bill, they pass to the guardian, who will only sell under order of the orphans' court for maintenance and support of his ward. There is no necessity for the gentleman's amendment.

The bill was passed.

Mr. JENKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF PENSION.

Mr. RUSK. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report back a bill (H. R. No. 994) to increase pensions in certain cases, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that all persons who, while in the military or naval service of the United States and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally and permanently disabled in both, shall be entitled to a pension for each of such disabilities, and at such a rate as is provided for by the provisions of the existing laws for each disability; provided that the act shall not be so construed as to reduce pensions in any case.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is intended to reach a class of cases heretofore omitted, and that is those who have lost one foot and one arm, or one leg and one arm. There are only sixteen such cases borne upon the pension-roll, and this provides a pension for each disability, only bringing them up to those pensioners who have lost both hands or both eyes or both legs. It is evidently just, and I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. This bill appears to be reported back with amendments.

Mr. RUSK. The amendments are merely verbal corrections which were ordered by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the bill come in as an original bill reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. RUSK. Very well; I report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill (H. R. No. 1564) to increase pensions in certain cases.

The bill was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ALLUVIAL BASIN OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed ten thousand copies of the report of the commission of engineers appointed to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation, with the accompanying maps, as follows: Two thousand copies for the use of the Senate and eight thousand for the use of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

CHANNEL BETWEEN STATEN ISLAND AND NEW JERSEY.

Mr. BALLOU, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the accompanying map be printed with the engineer's report on the plan for the improvement of the channel between Staten Island and New Jersey, received from the Secretary of War January 5, 1876.

Mr. BALLOU. I will simply say, in relation to this map, that the cost will be about fifty dollars. The survey has been made, and the report is worthless without the map.

The resolution was adopted.

HOME-CONSUMPTION AND IMPOST STATEMENTS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that it do pass:

Resolved, That there be printed six hundred extra copies of the home-consumption and impost statements, being Nos. 21 to 29, inclusive, of the annual report on commerce and navigation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, three hundred for the House, one hundred for the Senate, and two hundred for the Treasury Department.

The resolution was adopted.

REPORT OF DISTRICT BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the same committee, also reported back with an adverse recommendation the following resolution; and the same was laid on the table:

Resolved, That the board of health of the District of Columbia be furnished with fifteen hundred extra copies of their annual report for 1874, constituting a part of the documents accompanying the President's late annual message.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and resume the consideration of the centennial appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask unanimous consent to present a memorial and ask that it be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

AGRICULTURAL SCHOOLS.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of W. W. Long, master of the State Grange of Texas, and others, for an additional appropriation of public lands for agricultural schools; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the petition be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

SIR: The undersigned, the executive committee of the Texas State Grange of Patrons of Husbandry, representing a large portion of the agriculturists of the State of Texas, would most respectfully represent unto the honorable body over which you preside that in most of the States of these United States the appropriation made by your honorable body to the several States for the purpose of establishing agricultural and mechanical colleges in the several States has been expended in the construction of the necessary buildings and purchase of grounds, and that many of the States from their financial embarrassment are not now able to realize the benefits and advantages of this wise and judicious appropriation; and as the necessity for a more general and practical education exists, a system of education for the masses of our people which will tend to aid a higher and better development of our civilization and a more scientific improvement of agriculture and the mechanic arts, the very foundation of a nation's prosperity and the great moving power of the world; the noble act of Congress of 1862 rises like a sun of glory to dispel the confusion and reveals to us and our children the practical kind of education rather than a special strain for a speculative and literary kind of knowledge. The necessity for such an education is seen and felt in our every-day life. No argument can discredit the high place the farmer and mechanic occupy in the rapid progress of our epoch in the world's history. The endowment made by the Government through the influence of far-seeing statesmanship is well calculated to thrill the hearts and minds of the people of every State and Territory with the grand principle that the teaching demanded by our people is useful knowledge, a knowledge of "how to make meat and bread," an industrial education which will increase the wealth and promote the prosperity of the nation.

In consideration of these advantages, your petitioners, in the interests of the agriculturists of the State of Texas, would most respectfully invite the attention of your honorable body, and humbly ask that such additional appropriation of the public lands be made to the several States as may be necessary to the full and perfect endowment of the agricultural and mechanical colleges of the States, and such as will place them in complete and substantial operation.

Your petitioners respectfully ask that an appropriation of twenty thousand acres of the public lands for each member of Congress be made to the States for that purpose.

WILLIAM. W. LONG, Chairman.
W. WARREN.
H. B. SIMONDS.
J. E. GRAY.

Hon MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

PRINTING FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House immediately with full and detailed reports of the work done for the War Department and each and every separate Bureau and office therein by the Government Printing Office during the two years ending December 31, 1875, the report to state the number, pages, size, and cost of the various books ordered by the Department and furnished by said Government Printing Office, and, if bound, the character and quality of the binding, the number, size, nature, and cost of the various bills, blanks, and forms of every kind furnished by said Government Printing Office, and that accompanying the report the Secretary send, so far as may be practicable, copies of the various blanks and forms printed for and furnished his Department by said Government Printing Office during said two years ending December 31, 1875.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing, of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] is chairman, and which can report at any time.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Very well.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to withdraw the objection to the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, being assured by him that it is important that it should be considered at once. He desires the information as chairman of the Committee on Printing.

There being no further objection, the resolution was agreed to.

ORDER TO PRINT.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. On the 5th of January I introduced a bill (H. R. No. 410) for the relief of J. G. Fell, Edward Hoopes, and George Burnham, trustees, which, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and, with accompanying papers, ordered to be printed. But the order to print was not entered on the Journal. I ask that it may now be entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The entry will be made in the Journal on the authority of the RECORD.

TENURE OF PRESIDENTIAL OFFICE.

Mr. KNOTT. The joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution limiting the tenure of the presidential office was made the special order for to-day after the morning hour. At the request of several gentlemen on both sides of the House I desire to move that the special order be postponed until next Tuesday, and made the special order for that day after the morning hour.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

UTE INDIANS.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas a treaty was made with the confederated bands of the Ute Indian Nation in September, 1873, by Felix R. Brunot, a commissioner in behalf of the United States, and by the terms of which treaty the said confederated bands of Ute Indians, on the one part, relinquished to the United States a portion of their reservation theretofore conveyed to them by the United States, and which portion conveyed embraces what is known as the "San Juan mining country," in Southwestern Colorado, and the United States, on the other part, and in consideration thereof, among other things, agreed to set apart and hold as a perpetual trust for the said Ute Indians a sum of money, or its equivalent in bonds, sufficient to produce the sum of $25,000 per annum, to be disbursed for the use of said Indians; and whereas the said treaty was ratified by act of Congress approved April 29, 1874, and in the act ratifying said treaty it was expressly provided that "the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue, set apart, and hold as a perpetual fund in trust for the Ute Indians, a sufficient amount of 5 per cent. bonds of the United States the interest on which shall be $25,000 per annum, which interest shall be paid annually, as the President of the United States may direct, for the benefit of said Indians;" and whereas the said Ute Indians, in pursuance of said treaty, delivered the said territory into the possession of the United States, and the same has been opened to immigration and settlement, and thousands of settlers have entered into said territory for farming and mining purposes; and whereas it appears by the annexed letter and petition signed by reliable citizens of Colorado, many of whom are members of its Legislature and constitutional convention that the Government of the United States has wholly failed to carry out its part of the treaty stipulation, and for that reason the said confederated tribes of Ute Indians are becoming restless and dissatisfied, and threaten to drive the settlers from the relinquished territory, and that an Indian outbreak is imminent, which, if it occurs, must result in great loss of life and the destruction of the great material interests of one of the richest gold and silver producing regions on the continent: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be required forthwith to investigate whether or not the said bonds have been set apart as by law required, and whether or not the interest thereon, or any portion of it, has been disbursed for the benefit of said Indians, and whether or not the Government has failed in any other respect to comply with its said treaty stipulations, and what action or legislation, if any, is necessary to prevent the existence of those conditions which it is charged make an Indian outbreak and massacre imminent, and report the result of its investigations to this House.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent that a statement explaining the facts and a petition of the citizens of La Platte County be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection. The papers are as follows:

DENVER, COLORADO December 29, 1875.

SIR: At the request of the settlers and miners residing in the southwestern portion of this Territory upon the Lower Animas, La Plata, Los Pinosa, and Mancos Rivers I desire to call your attention to the following facts, and respectfully urge that, if possible, the attention of Congress be directed to the state of affairs existing in that section of Colorado and steps at once taken to remedy the existing wrongs.

It is now considerably over two years since the treaty ceding what is known as the San Juan mining country was signed by the Utes, and nearly two years since the same was ratified by Congress; yet there has been no provision made for the payment to these Indians of the promised sums of money and goods, nor has there been an agency established west of Pagosa Springs, as they claim they were promised; or if an appropriation has been made for that purpose, no part of it has been as yet expended for their benefit. Under these circumstances it is but natural that the Utes have become exceedingly irritated and angry on account of the non-fulfillment of the treaty on the part of the Government. They say that they were not willing to give up possession of the ceded land until they had received payment therefor; that they have been put off time and again with false promises; that the whites have come in and settled up the country without paying them anything; and that they will not submit longer to what they consider a great outrage upon their rights. They have not as yet committed any depredations beyond burning a few houses and destroying a portion of the past year's crop, and these acts, indeed, were committed by young, unruly braves, without the sanction or authority of the head chiefs, who have heretofore shown a friendly disposition and a desire to avert anything that might lead to hostilities. Nevertheless the chiefs have told us plainly that the country did not belong to the white men, but to the Indians, because they had never paid for it, and that we must leave; and have fixed upon a time at which, if they are not previously satisfied in their claims, they will drive the whites away from the valleys of the Animas, La Plata, and adjacent streams. Meanwhile these valleys have become settled with a considerable population engaged in agriculture and mining, and any attempt on the part of the Indians to drive out this population could only result in the sacrifice of many lives and a most serious blow to the future prospects of the San Juan country.

It is my own firm belief that this trouble will inevitably ensue within the next six months if some steps are not taken to prevent it. There are no troops stationed within two hundred miles of this country. The Utes are well armed, are good marksmen, and have a confidence in themselves as yet unshaken by any serious encounter with the whites. Moreover they are smarting under a sense of deep wrong, and are in that dangerous frame of mind when a slight spark may kindle a general Indian war. I do not wish to be considered an alarmist, but I respectfully submit that these facts are sufficient to justify our apprehensions and our request that you use every means in your power to have this matter settled at once and the Indians satisfied in some way or other.

There is no bitter feeling between the whites and the Utes, but, on the contrary, the friendliest relations have existed up to the present day. There is, moreover, a general sentiment among all who live in that section, even with those who have suffered from the depredations before mentioned, that the Indians have been unfairly treated, that they are justifiable in asserting their rights even to the extent of endeavoring to regain possession of the country. On the other hand, the numerous ranchmen and miners who have settled in that country—the southern portion of La Plata County, north of the reservation, which has in no way been infringed or intruded upon—feel that they also have rights there which they do not propose to give up without a struggle. Thus from no fault either on the part of the Indians or the whites an Indian war becomes possible, in which many lives would inevitably be lost and a blow be given to one of the most promising of the newly developed sections of the Territory from which it would be many years in recovering.

I can vouch for the truth of these statements, having lived on the Lower Animas River for the past two years. I am moreover acquainted with many of the Indians, and have had the best opportunities of ascertaining their feeling upon this subject. And, finally, I am convinced if something is not done before spring there will be trouble with these Indians of a very serious character.

I inclose a petition from the residents of that country, requesting you to use your influence toward the establishment of a military post and agency somewhere near the line of the new reservation. It is greatly desired by both the Indians and the whites, and I trust you will give it your attention.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. M. TRIPPE.

Hon. T. M. PATTERSON.
Washington, D. C.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION,
Denver, January 3, 1876.

I indorse the above statement as correct from a personal knowledge of the facts, and unite with him in urging immediate action by the authorities at Washington as the only means of averting serious trouble.

HENRY R. CROSBY,
Representative Twenty-fourth District.

The foregoing statement of Hon. T. M. Trippe is known to me to be correct in every particular, and is cheerfully indorsed.

I. N. PEYTON,
Member Eleventh Representative District.

The letter of Mr. Trippe gives a fair and correct statement of the condition of affairs on the borders of the Indian (Ute) reservation, as I know from personal knowledge, having talked with many Indians and whites interested, and living myself in that region of the Territory. I most cheerfully indorse and urge Mr. Trippe's recommendations and suggestions.

DENVER, January 1, 1876.

ADAIR WILSON,
Member of Territorial Council.

I indorse the foregoing.

R. J. MCNUTT,
Member House of Representatives Colorado Territory.

The facts set forth in the above statement are correct according to the best of my knowledge.

W. B. FELTON,
Member of Constitutional Convention Fifteenth District.

HOWARDSVILLE, LA PLATA COUNTY, COLORADO.

Hon. THOMAS PATTERSON,
Delegate to Congress, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, citizens of La Plata County, miners and farmers, mechanics and settlers, generally, respectfully represent that we deem it due to the development of this region, in the first place, that the pioneers should be protected by the United States Government against all dangers from the Indians, who have in the last twelve months taken hostile attitudes in several instances.

The mineral wealth which is deposited by nature in this region seems to demand the location of a military post in the vicinity, so that its development, which is of so much importance not only to our individual citizens but also to the country at large, may be carried on to its fullest extent, and by its safety and security may invite enterprise and capital.

In the second place it is due to ourselves and families, as law-abiding citizens of the United States, always ready to uphold the power of the United States Government.

We further represent that the military post at Fort Garland seems to have outlived its usefulness and the purpose for which it was created, being now too far removed from the scene of action against the Indians by the steady onward march of civilization; and if that post were abandoned and removed to some part of the southern portion of La Plata County, perhaps the lower valleys of the Animas or La Plata River, there would be no addition to the budget of expenses, excepting the removal of the fort and erecting a new one.

We further represent that it would be of incalculable value to the development of this region if the Government, for the purpose of establishing a fort in the southern part of this county, would lend its powerful aid to build a military wagon-road from Del Norte along the Rio Grande River across the summit over the Cunningham, Maggie, or Minnie Gulch Pass, whichever would upon investigation be found to be the most practicable into the Animas Valley, passing the towns of Howardsville and Silverton and down into the lower valley of the Animas River.

We respectfully ask you to press our claims upon the Government at Washington, and use your best efforts and influence to secure for us the benefits of this petition.

J. P. WALLACE and others.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT BEAUFORT, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. WADDELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1565) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate for the purchase of a building for a custom-house and post-office at Beaufort, North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. RANDALL. I now insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the centennial appropriation bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the Chair allow me to ask if the rule limiting debate to fifteen minutes will prevail to-day?

The SPEAKER. It will, unless otherwise ordered by the House.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] who has charge of this bill that he had better limit the general debate.

Mr. RANDALL. It has already been limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It has not been limited so as to close the debate at any specific time.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are thirteen names on the Speaker's list of gentlemen who still desire to speak, and, if we continue the fifteen-minute rule, it will be impossible to get rid of this bill to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. I would not wish to interfere with the purpose of my colleague from Pennsylvania who has charge of this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then we will make it uniform, and I move that debate shall hereafter be limited to ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was adopted; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Allow me to suggest that that does not limit the general debate on the bill. The general debate in ten-minute speeches may run on indefinitely unless the gentleman who has charge of the bill shall limit the general debate to two or three hours.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] applies only after the first speech.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered that speeches hereafter be limited to ten minutes

The question was then taken on Mr. RANDALL'S motion, and it was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WOOD, of New York, in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I am gratified at having this opportunity to present my views upon the bill now before the House, a bill, sir, which is to provide the means by an appropriation for carrying into effect the object of the act of March 3, 1871, an appropriation which in my judgment is demanded by the highest considerations of national duty and honor. Let us consider for a moment what the bill of March 3, 1871, is. The act is entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania in the year 1876. And after a preamble, setting forth the propriety of such a celebration, and that such celebration should be a national one in which the people of the whole country should participate, and that it should have the sanction of the Congress of the United States, the first section of the act provides as follows:

That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania in the year 1876.

Sir, it is to be held "under the auspices of the Government of the United States," which is, under the protection, patronage, support of the Government of the United States. And, Mr. Chairman, it is to be held under the superintendence and direction of the centennial commission, which is to consist of not more than one delegate from each State and Territory of the United States, whose functions are to continue until the close of the exhibition, said commission to be appointed by the President of the United States on the nomination of the governors of the States and Territories, respectively.

The sixth section provides that the commission shall report to Congress, at the first session after its appointment, a suitable date for opening and for closing the exhibition; a schedule of appropriate ceremonies for opening or dedicating the same; a plan or plans of the buildings; a complete plan for the reception and classification of articles intended for exhibition; the requisite custom-house regulations for the introduction into this country of the articles from foreign countries intended for exhibition; and such other matters as in their judgment may be important.

Subsequently, by act of June 1, 1872, a centennial board of finance was incorporated, the preamble of which act, after reciting the object of the act of March 3, 1871, declared that such provisions should be made for procuring the funds requisite for the aforesaid purposes of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania "as will enable all the people of the United States who have shared the common blessings resulting from national independence to aid in the preparation and conduct of said international and memorial celebration under the direction of commissioners of the United States."

Section 2 of the act creating the centennial board of finance provides—

> That said corporation shall have authority, "and is hereby empowered, to secure subscriptions of capital stock to an amount not exceeding $10,000,000, to be divided into shares of $10 each, and to issue to the subscribers of said stock certificates therefor under the corporate seal of said corporation."

The same section provides—

> That the proceeds of said stock, together with the receipts from all other sources, shall be used by said corporation for the erection of suitable buildings, with their appropriate fixtures and appurtenances, and for all other expenditures required in carrying out the objects of the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and which may be incident thereto.

Section 7 of said act of June 1, 1872, provides that the grounds for the exhibition shall be prepared and the buildings erected by said corporation in accordance with plans which shall have been previously adopted by the United States Centennial Commission, and the rules and regulations of said corporation, governing rates for entrance and admission fees, or otherwise affecting the rights and privileges or interests of the exhibitors or of the public, shall be fixed and established by the United States Centennial Commission, and that no grant conferring rights or privileges of any description within their said grounds or buildings or relating to said exhibition or celebration shall be made without the consent of the United States Centennial Commission; and said commission shall have power to control, change, or revoke all such grants, and shall appoint all judges and examiners, and award all premiums.

By section 10 it is provided, that as soon as practicable after the exhibition shall have closed, it shall be the duty of said corporation to convert its property into cash, and, after the payment of all its liabilities, to divide its remaining assets among its stockholders pro rata in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock, and it shall be the duty of the United States Centennial Commission to supervise the closing up of the affairs of said corporation, to audit its accounts, and submit in a report to the President of the United States the financial results of the Centennial.

By section 13 of the same act it is provided, that it shall be the duty of the United States Centennial Commission to make report from time to time to the President of the United States, and in a final report present a full exhibit of the results of the United States centennial celebration and exhibition of 1876.

Sir, this places the whole management and control of the celebration and the organizing and the carrying out of the details of the same in the hands of the officers of the United States. The Centennial Commission and the Centennial Board of Finance are the officers of the United States duly appointed for that purpose. It has been declared here that the Centennial Board of Finance is a private corporation. Sir, it is not a private corporation; it is a misnomer to call it a private corporation; it is an organized agency of the United States, and as such it has proceeded to raise funds, to erect suitable buildings, and to make the preparations requisite for the celebration inaugurated by the United States. Sir, it can do nothing but aid carry out this celebration. The President of the United States has invited, by the authority of the act of June 5, 1874, the governments of other nations to be represented and to take part in this celebration.

Thirty-eight foreign nations have accepted this invitation of the President upon the condition that suitable space shall be provided them without charge. By the authority of the United States our own citizens have been invited to take part in the celebration as exhibitors upon the same condition. The United States is bound by every principle of honor to see that suitable provisions are made, both for its own and foreign exhibitors. Sir, the liability has already been incurred: the giving of the invitations by the United States and the acceptance of such invitations fix the liability of the United States. It cannot avoid it. It must respond to and discharge it. The Centennial Board of Finance cannot do this. It has done its utmost to meet the requirements of exhibitors. It has raised large sums of money and rendered most efficient service to the United States in carrying out the arrangements for its centennial celebration. It needs the funds asked for in this bill to complete such arrangements. No one claims that the sum asked for is too large. It is admitted that the amount is required, and also that the officers of the Government, both the Centennial Commission and the Centennial Board of Finance, have been efficient and faithful.

Sir, the arrangement for the celebration must be completed. Suitable space for exhibitors, both foreign and domestic, must be provided. Who will do it if the United States does not? Who besides the United States is bound to do it? No one, I submit. The responsibility rests nowhere but with the United States. But we are told that all the arrangements have been made, all the invitations given, with the express agreement that the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition. With whom has such an agreement been made? Certainly not with the Centennial Commission or the Centennial Board of Finance, its own agencies. It has not made this agreement with those foreign nations invited to engage in the celebration by bringing here their treasures for exhibition. Neither has it been made with the people at large. It has, sir, no such agreement with any corporation or individual. Sir, the whole history of the affair shows this, and nothing more, that it was the purpose and expectation of the United States, through its officers, to pay the expenses attending this celebration out of voluntary contributions, and not out of the Treasury of the United States. The Government was to pay the expenses of the celebration; and if it cannot raise the necessary funds by voluntary contributions, they must be raised by an appropriation. Not to do this is to violate a solemn obligation.

Sir, objection is made to this bill because it provides that the United States shall only share pro rata with the voluntary contributors in any funds that may remain after meeting all the expenses of the celebration. Sir, this is no cause of complaint. The provision in the bill is right. It places the voluntary subscriber and the United States upon the same footing. It was contemplated to raise the full amount needed to make all necessary preparations for the Centennial by voluntary subscriptions. Sir, shall those who originally contributed fare worse than they would if the whole amount had been thus contributed? They certainly ought not to be punished for their generosity. It will be unjust to them to place them in any other position than that in which they are placed by this bill. This bill places the voluntary contributors in the same position as if the whole amount had been raised as contemplated; any other provision would be most unjust to them. It would be taking an advantage of those whom the Government is under every obligation to treat with liberality. It is unfair to call them stockholders in the ordinary sense of that term. They are not, in fact, stockholders; the term is only used for convenience; the just term is contributors. The subscriptions, in fact, were conditional—upon the condition that no more of the subscription shall be used than is actually required for the purpose of the celebration. This is the whole of it; and for this they are called speculators and censured. Sir, I have no sympathy with that spirit which can censure where praise is due.

Now, sir, we are told that we have no constitutional right to pass this bill. Sir, we have not only a constitutional right to pass it, but there is a constitutional obligation upon us to do so. The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts of the United States, and has not the Government contracted a debt, an obligation, which requires this appropriation? Will not its failure to discharge its obligation in this particular be a repudiation of its obligation? It is said we have no right to appropriate money for such a purpose. Why not? It is to meet obligations existing under existing laws. You have no right to nullify an existing law by withholding an appropriation. Mr. Chairman, no objection has been made by any one to either of the laws providing for the centennial celebration. This legislation has been treated as if it were perfectly constitutional; and if that is constitutional, then certainly this appropriation must be. But it may now be said that the original bill providing for the centennial celebration is unconstitutional. If it be so, it by no means follows that we have not the right and that it is not our duty to make this appropriation. An unconstitutional act may create constitutional obligations. A government may justly be called upon to repair the injury its unauthorized acts have done.

But I take the ground squarely that the original bill is strictly constitutional. If I am asked where I find the provision of the Constitution which makes this bill constitutional, I answer that this is one of the implied powers, a power necessarily implied from the existence of the Government itself. It is necessary to its very life. My distinguished colleague from the Worcester district, [Mr. HOAR,] in the argumentative interrogatory which he put the other day to the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] stated the proposition substantially.

The power to do whatever is necessary for the proper manifestation and representation of the Government in the various relations which it occupies in respect to foreign nations, to the several States, or to its own citizens must be involved in the existence of the Government, whatever theory may be adopted as to the mode by which it was created; and this power is given to the Government of the United States by the Constitution by necessary implication in the creation of the Government itself. This power may justly be said to be an attribute of government.

The power to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence is not derived from the provision "to provide for the common defense and general welfare." It is generally conceded that these words contain no substantive grant of power, nor is it derived from the "power to regulate commerce with foreign nations," for certainly the celebration of the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence cannot in any just sense be said to be a regulation of commerce. The fact that it is to be celebrated by an international exhibition cannot affect the power. The celebration is the substantive matter, the exhibition is simply a mode of celebrating. Nor is it derived from the power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts," for the Constitution prescribes the particular mode by which that is to be done. Any attempt to find this power except as granted by necessary implication will in my judgment be found to be wholly unavailing. The great advantages which may be derived from the particular mode in which that anniversary is to be celebrated cannot in any manner affect the question of power. Nothing is more dangerous than to invoke motive and expediency to determine a question of power. The power cannot be derived from any term designating the Government of the United States. Calling it a nation does not increase its power nor does calling it a confederation of States diminish it. It is by whatever name designated a government created by the Constitution, and all its powers derived therefrom are expressly given or by necessary implication.

Without these implied governmental powers we have no right to establish a national flag. Where do we find any express grant in the Constitution to establish a flag? Nowhere, I submit. We get it only under the principle I have laid down. The establishing of a flag is not a regulation either of the Army or Navy. It is the flag of our common country—the flag of the whole people. It is the emblem, the symbol of the nation. It represents alike its power and its beneficence, its honor and glory. Sir, Congress under the old Confederation fully recognized the principle for which I contend, although not possessing the power we possess. On the 29th of October, 1781, it passed the following resolve for a monument to commemorate the surrender of the British army, at Yorktown, by Lord Cornwallis to General Washington:

Resolved, That the United States in Congress assembled will cause to be erected in York, in Virginia, a marble column, adorned with emblems of the alliance between the United States and his Most Christian Majesty; and inscribed with a succinct narrative of the surrender of Earl Cornwallis to his excellency General Washington, commander-in-chief of the combined forces of America and France; to his excellency the Count de Rochambeau, commanding the auxiliary troops of his Most Christian Majesty in America, and his excellency Count de Grasse, commanding in chief the naval army of France in Chesapeake.

And this resolve, sir, was reported by a committee of which Edmund Randolph was chairman, who if he is not the ancestor of the member of Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is his distinguished relative.

Also, June 1, 1784, it passed the following preamble and resolve:

Whereas on the 25th day of January, 1776, Congress did resolve that a monument be procured in Paris, or any place in France, with an inscription sacred to the memory of General Montgomery, which in consequence thereof was procured and sent to the care of Mr. Hews, in North Carolina, and is now supposed to be in the care of his executors:

Resolved, That the executors of Joseph Hews, esq., or the person in whose possession the monument is, be requested to deliver the same to the order of the superintendent of finance, to be transported to the city of New York, to be erected in such part of the State of New York as the Legislature thereof may judge proper; and that the expense accruing thereon be paid by the United States of America.

Also, August 8, 1786, the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of Nathanael Greene, esq., at the seat of the Federal Government, with the following inscription: "Sacred to the memory of Nathanael Greene, esq., native of the State of Rhode Island, who died the 19th of June, 1786, late major-general in the service of the United States and commander-in-chief of their Army in the southern department, the United States in Congress assembled, in honor of his patriotism, valor, and ability, have erected this monument."

Resolved, That the board of Treasury take order for due execution of the foregoing resolution.

There are to be found on the journals of the Congress of the Confederation numerous other resolutions of this same character. And I cite them, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of showing that these implied governmental powers were fully recognized in that Congress, which was composed of many of the same men who framed the Constitution of the United States; and if it had not been the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to grant these and similar powers to the United States by necessary implication, it would have been so declared in the Constitution. And as these powers have been exercised under the Constitution, as has been so fully shown in this debate, with the sanction of the highest constitutional authorities, the existence of the power claimed in the case cannot be fairly questioned. As I have before said, no one in this debate has directly questioned the power of Congress to pass the original bill. It is only the power to grant the appropriation which is questioned. Even the able constitutional lawyer from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] admitted in this debate in clearest manner that the original act is constitutional. He, after stating that there is a provision in the constitution of the State of Virginia which prohibits her from making an appropriation, and that Virginia is deeply indebted, says:

But, Mr. Chairman, despite all these obstructions, Virginia will be there. Her people who are able to go will be there. She has given daughters to the Union, six fair daughters, with wealth and plenty in their hands, who will go to the Centennial and represent the munificence and the patriotism of their aged and bereaved mother. And another daughter, her mountain child, torn from her by the Cesarian operation, will be present, with her infinite mineral wealth and her resources in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. And old Virginia, rent in twain, impoverished, in her weeds of widowhood, but with a heart throbbing high for the prosperity of the common country, with a soul as true to the constitutional Union as when she first proposed independence to her sisters, and declared it by the pen of her Jefferson and won it by the valor and virtue of her Washington, and as when, by the wisdom and prudence of her Madison, she lent her aid to frame the Federal Constitution. Yes, true to the principles of liberty and independence and honor, Virginia will be there in spirit hovering over the scene.

Sir, I am sure that it will not be admitted by the distinguished member [Mr. TUCKER] that it is possible for the people of Old Virginia or her seven daughters to attend or in any manner participate in an illegal and unconstitutional celebration of the centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. He could not have declared in stronger terms not only the constitutionality of the proposed celebration but its beautiful appropriateness. And I say again, when this power is settled the right to make a suitable appropriation to meet the expense of this celebration cannot be rightfully questioned. I am at a loss to see by what logic one can admit the right of the Government of the United States to do an act, and then deny its power to make an appropriation to meet the necessary expenses of that act.

Would the original bill of March 3, 1871, be any more constitutional if its provisions were carried out, as was the original purpose and plan, by voluntary contributions? Is the test of constitutionality to be appropriation or no appropriation? Are we to have this as constitutional law, that an act of Congress, if it can be carried out by voluntary subscriptions, is constitutional; if not, it is unconstitutional? Sir, is not the position assumed by those who oppose this bill on the ground that Congress has no constitutional power to pass it trifling with the Constitution itself? Are they not using this plea of unconstitutionality rather to avoid a constitutional obligation than to protect the Constitution from violation? Are they not bringing contempt upon that very Constitution which they profess to regard so sacredly by this attempt to use it as a justification for not discharging a solemn obligation? Sir, the most effectual method to honor and defend the Constitution is to promptly and cheerfully discharge all the obligations it imposes upon us. In this way will its grants of power and its limitations upon power be made most operative to secure to the whole people, in every relation in which they are placed by our complex system of government, the highest blessings it can bestow.

Sir, I have not discussed the question as to the material advantages which may result from this celebration. They will doubtless exceed all that has been claimed by the advocates of this bill. But, sir, they can have nothing to do with the question of power; they relate only to the proper mode and manner of exercising the power. The right of the United States to celebrate this anniversary carries with it as a necessary incident the right to celebrate in such a manner as shall in the judgment of Congress become the dignity and importance of the event and the character and position of the American Republic among the nations of the earth. Sir, I have not alluded to party considerations. In my judgment they are wholly foreign to the question before the House, which is a question which affects alike the honor and just pride of every American citizen. And, sir, I will only add that, in giving my vote in favor of the bill now under consideration, I shall not only give it for a constitutional and necessary measure, but shall at the same time both defend and illustrate the Constitution itself.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, while I rise to oppose this appropriation, it is not my purpose to decry the proper celebration of the centennial of American Independence. My highest wish is that our free institutions may be perpetuated for all time to come, and I gladly welcome those demonstrations which tend to keep alive the glorious memories of their birth and growth. The Constitution is the palladium of our liberties and the glory of our time. In the present instance, however, we are asked to celebrate this era in constitutional liberty in a manner which requires us to resort to questionable constitutional measures. The advocates of this bill do not pretend that the authority for the appropriation is expressly given in the Constitution, nor can they successfully urge that it is a means appropriate and necessary to carry into effect any of the delegated powers of the Constitution. And, indeed, no two of them can agree upon what provision of that instrument the pretended authority rests. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HOPKINS,] the chairman of the committee, contents himself with propounding various questions, and cites no provision of the Constitution upon which he rests the claim; the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] professes to find the authority in the treaty-making power; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] imagines that he discerns it in the combination of the powers to regulate commerce, provide for the payment of the public debt and the general welfare of the people; and other friends of the measure look to still other provisions to justify their action. With all this diversity of opinion who shall say that the constitutional power for such legislation is not extremely doubtful, if not entirely wanting? Sir, I cannot do more now than throw out these suggestions; full discussion of this very grave constitutional question is prohibited in the limited time allotted me.

Conceding, however, for the sake of the argument, that the power exists, there are other and, to my mind, sufficient reasons why this bill should not become a law.

From the time in 1871 when the centennial corporation was created by act of Congress the work has proceeded upon the express understanding with this and all other nations that the Government was not to become liable for a dollar of the expense attending it. If the appropriation had been asked in the first instance, it is fair to presume that the corporation would never have been created. And in every act of Congress upon the subject since 1871 the reservation of the liability of the Government has been clearly expressed. The President of the United States was not authorized to extend invitations to foreign nations until he had been first notified by the governor of Pennsylvania that suitable provision had been made for the accommodation of the exhibitors so invited. Here is the language of the statute:

That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose and for the exclusive control of the commission hereinafter provided for, then the President shall issue his proclamation.

The notification was given by the governor of Pennsylvania to the President on June 23, 1873, and the invitation thereafter extended to foreign nations. Now, however, we are to be told that the notification of the governor of Pennsylvania did not truly state the situation—that no suitable provision had been made for the accommodation of the exhibitors; and we are asked to appropriate one million and a half of dollars to save the nation from disgrace. Sir, if the honor of the Government has been jeopardized, let the responsibility rest where it justly belongs—upon those public officials who have violated the laws of Congress.

But foreign nations cannot misunderstand the attitude of this Government, for in the President's proclamation of invitation is cited this provision of the law:

Provided, however, That the United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, for any expense attending such exposition or by reason of the same.

With this notification, I cannot agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] when he says:

In one word, sir, this House has now nothing whatever to do with the centennial corporation incorporated in 1871 for the celebration of American Independence. The question which is brought here is brought by the President of the United States. He speaks of the United States as a contributor of the results of administration and the functions of Government to the exhibition at Philadelphia. He speaks of having invited the principal nations of the earth to make representations of their industries at this exhibition, and of an appropriation that is "appropriate"—that is his word—and necessary—that is my word—to discharge that duty which he, the President, has imposed upon the officers of the several Departments of the Government and of the measures taken to induce other governments to assist in the representation of the world's industries.

Let it not be forgotten that foreign nations have accepted their invitations with full knowledge of the mode and manner in which the exposition was to be conducted under the exclusive management and control of the centennial corporation. Such was the only purpose of the creation of the corporation, and everywhere—in the law, in the pledges made to the people, and in the invitations to foreign nations—it has been most clearly set forth that the Government was not to become liable for the expenditures.

One other feature it may be well to give a passing notice. That is the character of this exposition. It is not designed or calculated so much to celebrate the American idea of government as it is to exhibit the products, the material progress, and the arts and sciences of all the nations of the earth. If it were intended principally as a tribute to republican institutions in the United States, it would be manifestly improper to ask other powers and peoples, who entertain different notions and live under different forms of government, to come to our shores and participate as the nation's guests in the self-laudatory ceremonials. In saying this I do not undervalue the transcendant importance of constitutional government in promoting the prosperity and happiness of all people everywhere. What I mean to distinctly assert is, that this exposition is international not national in its character. It is more to exhibit the skill, genius, and material achievements of many nations than to glorify the political institutions of one. Such being its true character, this appropriation by Congress must be viewed without regard to the celebration of the centenary of the nation's existence. It would be equally proper and right to vote the appropriation in any other year for the purposes of an international exhibition.

The due celebration of the important event does not depend upon this appropriation nor upon the success of the exposition at Philadelphia. Our free institutions are enshrined in the hearts of the people, and they will herald their century's growth everywhere throughout the land with spontaneous acclamations of pride and joy.

Furthermore, I do not believe the exposition at Philadelphia will fail. Its failure is a reason urged here in behalf of this appropriation, but it does not fall with convincing force upon my mind. Already nearly $5,000,000 from the various sources have come to the hands of the centennial board, and of this amount nearly three millions were a pure donation, and the buildings and grounds are almost ready for the exhibition. It has gone too far, therefore, to fail. The property and receipts can be anticipated and pledged to secure all the means needed for the proper completion of the work.

The act of Congress creating the corporation provides that—

I know it has been said the laws of Pennsylvania do not recognize any such a thing as a chattel mortgage upon these buildings, which are situated upon ground not owned by the centennial corporation. But the act of Congress can be made effectual, and gives the board a more enlarged power. Under it the board has not only power to pledge its property, but also its prospective income. By the act of its creation it has power to enter into contracts, to sue and be sued, and in many other ways, besides the resort to mortgage under State law, it may secure the necessary means to complete the undertaking. And when the exposition is over, under the articles of incorporation, the profits are to be divided among the stockholders. The real question presented, therefore, as I regard it, is not whether there shall be a success or failure of the exposition, but whether the stockholders shall have a million and a half profits more to divide principally among themselves.

It is said that in the beginning it was expected that the voluntary contributions would be sufficient to insure its success, but that, in consequence of the unforeseen financial embarrassments and business distress, the people have not responded so liberally as was anticipated, and therefore the aid of Congress must now be invoked. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] said:

Our aid is invoked in behalf of an international exhibition conceived by patriotic men as a fit way to commemorate the first centenary of American Independence. This undertaking was commenced when the busy hum of cheerful industry echoed throughout the land, when wealth and prosperity abounded in the North, and returning cheerfulness illumined the hitherto desolate South. But the storm of 1873 which swept over the country left its pathway black with general ruin and universal gloom. The wheels of industry stood still, trade became lifeless, the human energies were palsied because confidence and hope were crushed. From that day until this there has been no break in the overhanging clouds. The enterprise under consideration, begun under such happy auspices, could not escape the mildew which blighted all things. * * * In this extremity the Government is asked to lend its helping hand to save the undertaking from failure and the country from disgrace.

In response to the logic of the gentleman, I would say that the wheels of industry continue to stand still, trade remains lifeless, and the energies of the people are still palsied; not from the want "of confidence and hope," as the gentleman asserts, but from bad financial management and from extravagance, fraud, and corruption in the public service. Want of confidence and hope is the consequence, not the cause, of the wide-spread business paralysis. The causes are real. The vast enterprises of forty millions of people are not to be blighted by fancies or fictions. The most potent agencies of a material character must be at work to bring about these dire results. Notwithstanding all this business stagnation, the proposition now before the House is to compel the people, willing or unwilling, able or unable, to do what the gentleman declares they have voluntarily refused in consequence of their destitute condition. Our first and highest duty as the Representatives of the people is to lift this incubus from their industries by wise and economic legislation. Retrenchment and reform are the crying needs of the hour. But those who are opposed to voting subsidies to this or any other corporation, and who are unwilling at a time like this—when labor is unemployed and thousands are in penury and want—to lend themselves to this enforced contribution, this increased taxation of a million and a half of dollars, are to be gratuitously charged with a lack of patriotism. Especially is this so with regard to those gentlemen on this side of the House coming from the South. From my estimate of the high character of these gentlemen, I do not believe they can be thus cajoled or dragooned into the support of a measure which their judgment does not approve. If their patriotism is to be thus questioned, what shall be said of the patriotism of the gentlemen on the other side of the House? With more than a two-thirds vote, they have steadily refused any such aid for the last four years. The necessity for an appropriation was as pressing at the last term of Congress as it can be to-day, yet the House defeated the bill by a vote of 92 in the affirmative to 138 in the negative—60 not voting.

In my judgment, sir, at this hour the best evidence of genuine patriotism is to be found in keeping the pledges made to the people against congressional aid to this enterprise, and in upholding the faith of that Constitution whose virtues and glories we are called upon to commemorate.

[When Mr. SOUTHARD had spoken ten minutes the hammer fell, and the following proceedings took place:]

Mr. YEATES. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] be permitted to finish his remarks.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman from Ohio; but I question whether the Committee of the Whole have the power to extend the time of any gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe that by unanimous consent the House made the order that debate on this bill should be limited to ten-minutes speeches after the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THOMPSON.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I hope that I may be allowed to be heard after so much has been said on the other side.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not object. I only call attention to what I understand to be an imperative rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] raise a point of order?

Mr. KELLEY. I raise the point that the Committee of the Whole cannot extend the time of any gentleman. It applies not only to this gentleman but to all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the Committee of the Whole is simply acting under the direction and order of the House, and that it has no power to extend the time.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I hope there will be no objection to my proceeding a few minutes longer. I do not often speak.

Mr. WARREN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WARREN.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask leave to print the remainder of my remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in North Carolina there lives an old man who in 1861 had six sons just grown up to manhood. At the first tap of the drum the six sons went to the front to fight for the cause of the South. They did not stop to reason much about it. North Carolina called for them and they went. Mostof them were over here at the first battle of Bull Run, and from there to Appomattox, they followed that bloody and fiery track of war all the way by Chickahominy, Fredericksburgh, Antietam, Chancellorsville, Chickamauga, Gettysburgh, Wilderness, and Petersburgh. There were not six when they got to Appomattox—there were but two. Four were sleeping in their bloody blankets; one at Antietam, another at Chancellorsville, another on the Chickahominy, and another in Kentucky. Two were at Appomattox, battle-scarred, to see the flag go down forever which they had followed with such unfaltering devotion. One of those two survivors stands here and speaks to you now, and he says that he has seen enough of war, and wants peace. He wants reconciliation; he wants good feeling; he wants fraternity everywhere in this country. And that is the reason, Mr. Chairman, why I propose to vote for this bill, because I think its tendency is to produce that peace which we need.

Why have we not had it? At Appomattox, Mr. Chairman, when we were waiting to see whether old "Uncle Robert" was going to tell us to charge or to surrender and did not know which, I went into a little church which stood close by, and there lay a large Bible on the stand and I opened it. The words which fell first on my eye were these, and they seemed prophetic: "Lo, the winter is past; the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land." I thought, Mr. Chairman, it was prophetic. I welcomed it as the harbinger of peace. Why is it not peace? Why have we not had peace? The soldiers fought the great question out with bayonets and muskets and cannon; but they have quit fighting. It is because a few restless political agitators still want to keep up the fight, and their only weapons are asses' jaw-bones. [Great laughter.] I have no capacity, Mr. Chairman, to participate in that kind of battle, and I am opposed to it as an unworthy afterpiece to a grand drama. I want peace.

It is urged, Mr. Chairman, that we need to save this money—this million and a half dollars. We do need economy, but we need also concord, confidence, good understanding in this country. O! if we had faith enough in one another, if there was faith in this country, in its different sections, and among all its people, the money would come forth from the coffers where it is now hoarded, the hard times would pass away, and general prosperity would return. The people who sent me here, it is true, sent me to help economize, but they sent me here also, or else I have misunderstood them, to promote peace and help bring about reconciliation and good understanding.

I vote for this bill also, Mr. Chairman, as a North Carolinian. North Carolina has a large interest in those glories which are to be celebrated on the 4th of July next. Let it not be forgotten that she first spoke the word independence at Mecklenburgh. Let it not be forgotten that she shed the first blood for liberty at Alamance. Let it not be forgotten that her sons, the mountain men, with the aid of a few gallant sons of Virginia and South Carolina, turned the tide of the Revolution toward final victory at King's Mountain. And we are coming to the Centennial, Mr. Chairman, though we are poor; and some of us will come in tears, remembering the past. Yet we are coming, the sons of the men of King's Mountain, and of Guilford, and of Alamance, to shake hands with the men of Brandywine, and Bunker Hill, and Monmouth, and restore peace in this country.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, that the soldiers could settle this thing if allowed to do so. Well, that will be a good time for them to settle it. I want to go there and shake by the hand the brave men I used to meet on the field. I admire them, I love them, I respect and I honor them. O, sir, with what reverence I stand always by the soldier's grave, whether he wore the "gray" or the "blue," because there sleeps a man who dared to die for his principles. [Great applause.]

I think of these things, Mr. Chairman, without bitterness, because you cannot tell me that any man died in vain in that war. This American people of ours is a money-loving, money-getting people, too fond of merely material interests, too sordid; and it needed the great lesson of self-sacrifice that it is worth while to die for sentiment and for principle. Our dead heroes have taught us that lesson.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, we are coming from the Cape Fear and the Albemarle, from the lowlands and the mountains. You will hear the bagpipes of our Scotchmen and the bugles of our mountaineers swelling the blast of the national jubilee. We want to shake hands with the gallant soldiers of the North. We hope to see such a greeting of the soldiers and patriots of the North and the South as will show to the whole Union that the flood-tide of sectional hatred has ebbed forever and that it remains no longer to float any freightage of unholy and unpatriotic ambition. And we want to show to the multitude of visitors from other nations how invincible we are when the heroes of the blue and the gray stand together in one common phalanx of amity and concord. There, my countrymen, let us renew our vows of fervent devotion to that common country which the righteous Arbiter of all things has decreed shall be forever one and undivided; and, turning our backs upon all bitter memories of the past and leaving our gallant fallen comrades on both sides to repose in "trembling hope" on "the bosom of their Father and their God," let us go forward with courageous hearts and patriotic aspirations in that path which duty and destiny have marked out for us. [Much applause.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to add my name to the list of those who have so earnestly protested against the passage of this bill. The enterprise is an important one, and I am sure that it will receive that generous support by individual contributions which will make it a financial success.

The American people are proud of Liberty Hall, and thousands of them, perhaps millions of them, are laying by a hundred or two of dollars to enjoy their Fourth of July in Philadelphia, in commemoration of the Declaration of Independence signed there one hundred years ago.

The prospect of entertaining so many visitors during the coming summer has induced Philadelphia and Pennsylvania and New Jersey and New York to make liberal donations. This is entirely proper. They have the credit of being exceedingly patriotic; they will have the satisfaction of knowing that they have grown richer, both directly and indirectly. Their liberality is no example for us to follow. If we pass this bill I am sure that the people will regard it as an unnecessary appropriation of their money.

In the language of the Ex-congressman [Hawley] of Connecticut who prophesied so correctly when the salary-grab bill was under consideration, "I say the country will not approve it; our own party will not approve it. There is no good reason for it."

Now, sir, what are we about to do? Here we are, a great nation, but overwhelmingly in debt; a hundred years old, but heavily burdened with taxation; a united people, but full of discordant elements: the majority for peace, but a large minority determined to rule or ruin.

It may seriously be doubted whether this is an appropriate time to celebrate our centennial year. Certainly we should not if the money must be wrenched from an over-taxed agricultural people. Especially is this true in view of the probability that this money is to benefit a certain patriotic ring.

And just here allow me to say I do not approve of the scheme which is evidently at work in this matter: pushing the amnesty bill with the centennial bill. The one is entirely distinct from the other, and action should not be taken on one with reference to the other.

I am in favor of general amnesty, including Jefferson Davis, on the ground of public policy. I am opposed to this appropriation on principle.

We are about to commit a grave error.

This enterprise has no claim upon the United States Government. We are under no obligation to pass this bill.

I refer to section 9 of an act relative the centennial international exhibition, found in the Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 210:

> But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim by the centennial international exhibition or the corporation hereby created for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debts or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized.

If we vote this appropriation, it will be to advance the financial condition of a ring whose patriotism consists in inordinate greed for money.

Members from Pennsylvania and the East may excuse their action on the ground that their section of country received the money. If they do, let me tell them that they should profit by the experience of my predecessor, who in a public speech justified his vote on the back-pay salary-grab on the ground that "he took the salary-grab, but his friends got all the money."

No, sir, we cannot justify our course if we make this appropriation. I desire to see the Centennial enterprise succeed. I believe it will be a grand success, and the pitiful story that it will be a failure if we do not lend a helping hand is false in fact, and was a money-loving, avaricious, dishonorable conception.

But if it should fail, if it should not prove a financial success, I shall not lose faith in the patriotism of the American people, for I shall then know what I now feel, that this should rather be a year of economy, thanksgiving, and prayer, rather than one of extravagance and thoughtlessness; and should the people hold it so, it will be the best pledge of the perpetuity of our free institutions.

Besides we have other uses for this money.

There are just debts that should be paid. I speak not of our recognized liabilities, but of private property which was taken during the late war for the benefit of the public. The fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution provides that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." And I for one am in favor of paying for everything which was taken from persons not in active rebellion for the benefit of the Federal forces in preserving this Union.

There are just pension claims which should be paid, and no Federal soldier should be debarred by statutes of limitations or legal technicalities.

The freedmen of the South should be educated, and the illiterate white people as well, in order that they may cast their votes intelligently.

The harbor at Norfolk should be improved, that it may be a port of entry to the South as New York is to the East and North.

The railroad from Chicago to Charlestown should be generously aided by Congress, to the end that a friendlier feeling may prevail between the North and the South, and that the vast coal-fields, iron deposits, and lumber forests of Southeastern Kentucky may find a market; that thousands of laborers may find homes and employment in a genial climate and in a section of the country unsurpassed in mineral and timber wealth; and, finally, that what are now pauper counties may become rich and prosperous as Pennsylvania and productive of revenue to the United States.

There we are, set down upon the northern slope of the Appalachian range of mountains, shut up to the most delightful climate, and shut out from the markets of the world, with a fertile and productive soil, with coal-fields which Professor Shaler, of Havard College, and State geologist for Kentucky, declares to be of more value in dollars and cents than all the gold of California. With inexhaustible resources of iron and salt and extensive forests of hickory, ash, poplar, and walnut, we can afford to give millions for developing such hidden resources of magnificent wealth which are five hundred miles farther from every other place than any other place in the world.

Cheap transportation should be accomplished from the West to the East, to the end that those who have been encouraged to pass by the fertile, healthful, naturally wealthy State of Kentucky, to settle in the far West, may receive fair remuneration for their honest toil.

There are many other worthy objects deserving our careful and favorable consideration which I have not time to mention.

Now, sir, if gentlemen were sincere in voting for the strong contra-subsidy resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, the leader of that side of the House, how can they now stultify themselves by supporting this bill? It will not do to say that this is an exception. If that resolution means anything, it means all that its strong language conveys. Let me read from the RECORD of December 16, 1875:

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit the following resolution, and on it demand the previous question:

"Resolved, That in the judgment of this House, in the present condition of the financial affairs of the Government, no subsidies in money, bonds, public lands, indorsements, or by pledge of the public credit, should be granted by Congress to associations or corporations engaged or proposing to engage in public or private enterprises; and that all appropriations from the public Treasury ought to be limited at this time to such amounts only as shall be imperatively demanded by the public service."

It has been decided that a common council of a city cannot give a Fourth-of-July entertainment and ball at the public expense. (Hodges vs. Buffalo, 2 Denio, 110; New London vs. Brainard, 22 Conn., 552.)

And I am not sure but that the Supreme Court of the United States would decide that the power which we are assuming to exercise is among those reserved to the States.

But I shall not vote against this bill on that ground. I am too young and inexperienced to become an expounder of constitutional law.

However, I am not too young to know the wishes of those who have honored me with a position that enables me to speak for them.

Mr. Chairman, these are hard times. The people are striving to live within their incomes. They are studying and practicing economy. On principle they are opposed to repudiation as much as they are in favor of general amnesty and reconciliation. But, sir, they are not in favor of appropriating a million five hundred thousand of their hard earnings to a Philadelphia ring for a Fourth-of-July celebration—a sum equal to the entire proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the year ending June 30, 1876. Think of that! A sum equal to the salaries of a thousand consuls, or to the notorious and infamous "retroactive increase-salary grab," known as the "back-pay steal."

The people are in earnest on the subject of reform. They demand a return to sound money. They demand a reduction of the salaries of public officials to a level with those doing similar service in private life. They demand strict economy and honest and speedy payment of the public debt. The South is bankrupt; the West is without a market; the East without employment; and the trade and commerce of the whole country unusually depressed. Certainly all this cannot be laid to the effects of the late war. No, sir; this state of things is in a large measure owing to extravagance and recklessness, public as well as private. Wait till we have paid our creditors, our citizens and soldiers; till universal education shall prevail and perfect peace is restored; then the American people can afford to pay a Philadelphia ring to conduct a Fourth-of-July jubilee. Wait, if it be a hundred years. If we appropriate anything let it be out of our own pockets, and not out of the public Treasury. But let us not be reckless with the people's money.

I offer the following amendment to that of the gentleman from New York:

Provided, That the aforesaid $1,500,000 shall be paid out of our salaries and the salaries of public officials receiving more than $1,500 per annum for the year ending June 30, 1877; And provided, That nothing in this act shall be enforced which shall violate any part of the Constitution of the United States; And provided further, That the doors to the centennial international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, shall be thrown open to the world free of charge for admission.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, on a former occasion, when this matter of the Centennial was under discussion, I ventured to predict that Wisconsin would sanction whatever should appear to be just and reasonable in the premises. I did this not as assuming to bind her in a pecuniary obligation, but rather as expressive of my confidence in the generosity, prudence, and patriotism of her people. Subsequently, when the three million appropriation bill came before the House, I, in common with others, felt constrained to vote against it, and I was conscious of no inconsistency in so doing. At that time this enterprise was comparatively undeveloped. It was unknown what private endeavor or municipal or State aid could or would do for its success. It was undetermined what interest foreign nations would take in this exposition or how far they would contribute to make it in fact as in name an international affair. A financial panic had stricken our commercial interests and paralyzed our industries. A deficiency was reported from the Treasury, and we felt compelled, by cutting and paring and retrenching and economizing in every conceivable manner, to save so much from the public expenditures as was then possible, cutting down the salaries of Government clerks, dismissing some of them, including, I believe, in some cases the widows and orphans of Union soldiers. Under these circumstances, to turn with a lavish hand and pour out upon an undeveloped enterprise $3,000,000, or one-sixth of what we had saved by all our endeavors at economy, seemed not to be sanctioned either by prudence or by any sound business principle.

It was further said that three millions voted then would be but an earnest for eight millions sure to follow; and certainly there was no way of controverting the proposition at that time.

Now, sir, this condition of things has in many respects changed. True, there is still distress among the people, and the necessity still exists for the practice of economy in every practical form, but as a nation we are neither impoverished nor bankrupt. There is no reason why we should take our position among the fifth-rate powers of Europe, or declare to the world that we are too poor to extend the courtesies common among nations. Besides, sir, it is now reasonably well determined what this exposition is to cost, and it is further known what the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania have done for this enterprise—one million and a half of dollars in the one case, and one million in the other; through private subscription and municipal aid over $4,000,000 contributed from this one Commonwealth alone. The enterprise no longer exists in theory or uncertainty, nor is it any longer a question of doubt how money contributed is to be applied. The centennial buildings stand to attest what has been accomplished and how the funds thus far have been handled. Men of practical experience, eminent in business and of conceded probity of character, if we have any such in this country, tell us that these immense sums have been economically and judiciously invested; that vouchers have been taken, accounts accurately kept; and reports submitted to the authorities render it almost impossible that money should be misappropriated without immediate detection, and that from the low price of labor and material money has actually been saved rather than squandered.

I know, sir, that the cry is in the air of "centennial steals," "Philadelphia schemes," and "credit mobiliers" already attaching to this enterprise. Let any fact appear tending to show this state of things, and no one will go further than I for their exposure and punishment. But for one I am unwilling to stand here forever legislating or refusing to legislate on the assumption that all men in America are rascals! continuous scoundrels, without any lucid intervals whatever! I am unwilling to admit that we have progressed so rapidly during the first hundred years of our national existence that we dare not make a needed appropriation for the celebration of our birthday lest some pious descendant of the Pilgrims shall steal the money! Steal it in the white city of Philadelphia, under the shadow of Independence Hall, and on the very ground where the immortal Penn first taught the savages of the forest that civilization and common honesty were possible! We must trust somebody if we are to legislate at all, and until some shall be forthcoming to truly impugn the motives, the integrity, or the efficiency of this board of managers, I am willing to trust them.

Sir, the ground upon which this appropriation has been urged in some instances during this discussion does not commend itself to my approval.

It has been said that Congress, by authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign nations to participate in this exposition, has bound itself to defray all necessary expenses by appropriations of money from the Treasury.

Sir, if this be true, if we are bound by our action heretofore to vote this million and a half of dollars for this exhibition, then by the same principle and by every principle of logic we are just as much bound to vote every dollar required to defray all the expenditures involved in this enterprise. For one I am unwilling to stand upon any such ground; for I do not forget that with every step of legislation asked for came the accompanying and fundamental assurance that not one dollar of expenditure should be taken from the public Treasury. And while I am not disposed to be critical, I would have preferred to have had this question rest upon its merits and upon the facts as I believe them to exist; and not even upon the appearance of an attempt to induce Congress to do by indirection what it never could have been prevailed upon to do directly. When this undertaking was first inaugurated times were good, business was active, money circulated freely, and there was enterprise, hope, and prosperity everywhere. These gentlemen, I have no doubt, sincerely believed that they could raise from private sources and by State and municipal aid the money necessary to insure the success of this enterprise. That they have raised so large a sum tends to confirm their good faith. I would have had them say to Congress, "We have acted in good faith; we have raised and invested this money; we have submitted our reports as required by law. Here are the results of our labors. The time for the opening of the exhibition approaches. We need this appropriation to make this exhibition one of the grandest the world has ever seen." And I would have Congress say in response: Take the money; invest it carefully; let your accounts and vouchers show how every dollar has been expended; give us a receipt in full; preserve your enterprise from all scandal, and let the exhibition be one worthy of the relations which our nation sustains to the other great nations of the world; so conduct it in all things that you do not

> Keep the word of promise to our ear,
> And break it to our hope.

Sir, the locality of this exposition has been questioned; but if you are to hold an international exhibition you must locate it somewhere. You cannot set it in the clouds, nor hold it in a dozen different cities at once. It seems to me that of all other places Philadelphia should be the place for the holding of this exhibition, situate as it is midway between the commercial and political metropolises of the nation, easy of access to both, and located among the historic associations and grand memories that cluster around the birthplace of the Republic.

Sir, I represent an intelligent, industrious, and frugal constituency. They would see no money squandered or lavishly expended, but whatever is necessary to maintain the respectability and honor of our nation in the presence of the representatives of other nations invited to our shores, I believe they would gladly give. Though times are hard we are not compelled to be niggardly, and if the nation is coming up to one grand centennial jubilee, I shall not believe until I am compelled to that any portion of our people would like to see the United States occupying no more prominent place in its own centennial grounds than is occupied by any one State of the Union or by any foreign nation—virtually a stranger, or at least an ordinary participant at its own hundredth anniversary. Too poor and too feeble to do more; while if even this appropriation be voted, foreign nations and individual foreigners will even then have expended more upon our own exposition than the United States have given! No; let us be reasonable in the matter; let us vote the requisite sum to properly identify ourselves with the enterprise. It shall be our exhibition. And then, with full protection guaranteed to all the rights of the humblest citizen in every part of the Republic, and when each one can feel that he is protected in all his rights as an American citizen, we will go up to the Centennial without one vengeful feeling left, and with a reconciliation and peace which shall come to stay, because it is founded in sincerity upon the principles of eternal right. [Applause.]

My time flies and I cannot enlarge upon this subject. The constitutional power of Congress to make this appropriation has been called in question, and if we are possessing the implied powers and attributes held by the great nations of the earth, most certainly we do have the power to make this or any similar appropriation.

That we are a nation and not a partnership of petty States having no common arbiter, but each its own arbiter at liberty to break the compact at will, I suppose had been settled, and settled forever, not only in the forum of discussion and the domain of constitutional law, but settled finally and forever on the bloody battle-fields of triumphant war.

And, sir, I had supposed that a nation which could man ships, march armies, suppress rebellion, repel foreign invasion, develop science, foster education, purchase territory, commemorate its own heroes and statesmen in marble and on canvas, extend courtesies to distinguished foreigners, inviting them to our shores, embellish and decorate its Capitol, beautify and adorn its public grounds, feed the famishing and the hungry in this country and in others, could at least exercise the common politeness of nations and do whatever may promote the general welfare with foreign powers.

But if we cannot do this, or if, as has been intimated, we are setting a bad precedent—if from our example we fear "all sorts" of nations may be found celebrating "all sorts" of centennials in "all sorts" of manner to the end of time—then let us vote this thing down. And having shorn ourselves of all power as a nation and divested ourselves of all interest in its centennial birthday, and having washed our hands of all lot and part in the matter, let us return sadly to our constituencies, but still preserving the consolatory thought embraced in the immortal hymn—

> I would not live alway, I ask not to stay.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GOODIN. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to cast my vote in silence against this measure, but upon reflection I feel that my duty to myself and my constituency demand alike that I should present some at least of the several reasons which actuate me in my refusal to vote of the people's money one and a half million dollars in aid of the centennial celebration to be held at Philadelphia.

Sir, at the outset of this debate the bill was opposed by several members of the House upon the ground that the Constitution of the United States gives no warrant, no authority, for such legislation as is here proposed. Among those who have upon this floor opposed the constitutionality of the bill the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] shone conspicuously. His speech was able, eloquent, and lawyer-like. He belongs to a school of politicians known as "strict constructionists." I hope without doing him an unkindness I may be permitted to say that, in my humble opinion, he would compress the Constitution until the life was fairly crushed out of it, while my friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] who sits at my right, would stretch it to death to make it serve his immediate purpose; and hence the logic of each would produce similar results.

We have heard a great deal during this debate about a "liberal" and "strict" construction of the Constitution. For my part I like neither expression. They remind me of a bill passed by a certain legislative body wherein it was declared:

> That this act shall be liberally construed for the promotion of justice and strictly construed for the prevention of wrong."

I take the Constitution to be a reasonably sensible instrument, and believe that it should be sensibly construed in the spirit of enlightened reason and according to the manifest intendment of it framers. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] finds authority to make this appropriation in the "treaty-making" clause of the Constitution, while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] finds a granite rock upon which to stand in the "power to regulate commerce." If their arguments in favor of the constitutional power of Congress to pass this measure fail to commend themselves to our judgment they at least are sufficient to elicit our admiration at their ingenuity of arrangement and the flourish of oratory in their presentation.

I have long observed in the legislation by Congress that this "palladium of our liberties" is made to play such fantastic tricks to gratify the whims or caprices of certain legislators that a "thus saith the Constitution" glibly falls from their lips whenever they need its aid to further their ends. I am glad to know that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] has not permitted his tranquillity to be disturbed by this vexed legal question. Hail Columbia, The Star-Spangled Banner, and The Battle-Cry of Freedom, with an occasional screech of the American eagle thrown in, settle the matter for him. If any of us had doubts as to his devotion to the flag and his unyielding attachment to "the best Government in the world," the speech made by him the other day upon this bill certainly dispels them. Other gentlemen who have spoken for the measure are equally happy. Old Fourth-of-July addresses, with very slight modifications, have been in active demand among the supporters of the bill, and the same patriotic outbursts of sentiment which have before electrified thousands have here been repeated with gratifying effect.

Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling to acknowledge that I feel less patriotic, less devoted to my country, less desirous of the accomplishment of the grand results so ardently predicted in the future than any of the numerous gentlemen who have addressed us during this discussion, and yet I will not, cannot consistently with my convictions of duty, support this bill. Nor will I withhold my vote upon the ground of a want of constitutional power in the Congress to pass it. If all other objections were removed than that supposed by some gentlemen to be presented by the Constitution, I think that without doing violence to the oath I have taken I could cast my vote for the bill, although I might not find the power of Congress where other gentlemen have placed it. Having said this much by way of introduction, let me call the attention of the committee to the legislation already had by Congress upon the subject of this centennial exhibition.

The first act passed was on March 3, 1871, which provided for centennial commissioners. After considerable discussion in both Houses, it was deemed proper that Congress should so far recognize the desire of the generous people of the country—who, as it was represented, were determined to have a celebration without governmental aid—that a commission should be appointed to receive their voluntary offerings and make suitable application of them. In this spirit and for this purpose only the act referred to was passed. How carefully the act is made to express both the avowed intentions of the outsiders, who were urging its passage, and of the law-makers! In section 7 of the act, it is provided—

> That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States, and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition or by reason of the same.

Thus we see, in the very commencement, that Congress expressly declared against making the Government of the United States pecuniarily responsible for this proposed exhibition; and I may add that those persons who had urged upon Congress the passage of the bill seemed content.

After the creation of the board of commissioners extensive preparations were made for thorough organization throughout the country, and soon the contributions of the people came pouring in! It was then thought necessary by the projectors of this movement that a board of finance should be created for the control of the funds voluntarily given by the people. And an act was passed creating the centennial board of finance. But lest at some time—of course it could not be within the recollection of those who knew the circumstances connected with the passage of the act of March 3, 1871—some "liberal" constructionist might seek to hold the United States responsible, it was expressly declared in the ninth section of the act creating the board that—

Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim by the centennial international exhibition or the corporation hereby created for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debt or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized.

Still the good work went on. The machinery being increased, more and better work was accomplished. The United States having by this legislation "recommended"—that is the proper word—the enterprise to the people, nothing more was needed, it was asserted, to make it a complete success.

Shortly after, in June, 1874, the centennial managers concluded upon a change of programme. Instead of an American holiday, a good old-fashioned Fourth-of-July celebration on a grand scale, a world's fair should be held, and the President was to invite foreign governments to come over and jollify with us, and bring along everything that would be of interest to us inquisitive Yankees. Accordingly, after a vigorous opposition by Mr. Sumner in the Senate and Mr. GARFIELD and others in the House, the act of June 5, 1874, was passed, "authorizing the Presdent in the name of the United States to extend cordial invitations to foreign governments" to attend the exposition; but still adhering to the determination that the Government should not be pecuniarily committed, it was provided—

That the United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, for any expenses attending such exposition or by reason of the same.

So up to June, 1874, the grand idea which was the basis of organization for this celebration, that the spontaneous contributions of the American people should furnish the means for the successful carrying on of the Centennial movement, was steadily kept in view, and still the work of preparation for the great event was vigorously pushed.

On the 3d day of March, 1875, the engraving and printing of the certificates of centennial stock were ordered, but in that act the United States Government sought to protect itself from other encroachments by providing:

That this appropriation shall not be construed as in any manner committing the Government of the United States to any other payment whatever to meet the expenses of said exhibition.

On the 7th of May, 1874, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said:

Last year I brought into the House from the Committee on Appropriations a bill to appropriate $20,000 to pay for printing the certificates of stock for the centennial association. I did so because there was a provision in one of the statutes relating to this commission, that the United States should cause these certificates to be engraved and printed. The committee recommended the payment of that amount because the national faith was pledged. But it will be remembered that the friends of the exhibition told us at the time that the printing of these certificates was the only thing in reference to which our faith was pledged.

Such, Mr. Chairman, were the various successive steps taken by Congress, and, whatever may be said as to the wisdom of the legislation, all must agree that there is perfect harmony in the various declarations of the refusal of the United States to become a business partner with the centennial commission in the matter of this celebration.

But, sir, the managers of this enterprise were not content with the oft-repeated declarations of Congress; they were not satisfied; and while the Representatives of the people were as they thought securely barring the highway to the Treasury another class of individuals were as industriously at work to force a passage to it. Accordingly an appropriation of $3,000,000 was asked for. The contest in the Senate as well as in this House was a lively one. The expectations of the commissioners had not been realized. As the whole world was to be represented at the Centennial, extensive preparations had to be made, and if the nation was to be saved from dishonor the bill must pass. It was avowed that the whole affair would be a disgraceful failure unless every dollar asked for was promptly given. But it was not given. The country would be dishonored, its good name imperiled, unless the appropriation was made. Nobody wished to witness so humiliating a spectacle. National pride flourished in the breasts of patriotic legislators then as now; the memory of the early struggle for American Independence and the recollection of the fearful cost of life and treasure to perpetuate our national existence were no less vivid than to-day; the desire to command increased respect for the country among the great powers of the earth was as great then as now, and yet the bill did not pass! But the noble work of constructing buildings at Fairmount Park and the ornamentation of the grounds whereon this great exposition was to be held progressed with increased rapidity; and to-day we are told by the friends of this bill that out of the total amount of money required to prepare for the opening up of the exposition on the 10th of May next, which is $6,724,850, the sum of $5,187,750 has already been secured. The failure of Congress to appropriate the $3,000,000 asked for did not "dishonor" the nation, nor did it materially impede the progress of the enterprise; and I do not believe that our refusal to vote the million and a half now applied for will either cause us shame or materially embarrass the exposition.

O, how keenly the advocates of this measure affect to feel the humiliation and disgrace consequent upon our denial of the expediency of giving away to this already prosperous corporation a million and a half of the people's money to accomplish a purpose to which, by solemn and oft-repeated declarations we were not to give a dollar! But we are "pledged" to it, say the advocates of this bill. The "national honor is at stake;" and if we would redeem our pledges and preserve untarnished our "national honor," we must rush to the rescue and satisfy and redeem them by application of that great American panacea, "irredeemable rag money." The arguments made in favor of the $3,000,000 appropriation were as powerful, to say the least, as are those in favor of this subsidy and are close in resemblance to them. I therefore desire to present a few quotations from a speech made by a Senator of the United States when the $3,000,000 appropriation bill was pending in the Senate. Unfortunately for the country, through a mysterious Providence which is "past finding out," his warning voice upon this measure is hushed in the awful stillness of that slumber which knows no waking.

Mr. Sumner, standing in his place in the United States Senate, said:

We have the declaration of my excellent friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] while this measure (meaning the bill providing for the appointment of commissioners) was under discussion in the Senate, that "it simply authorizes the Philadelphia people at their own expense to have a show;" and he added, "as a private bill I hope it will be passed." So, sir, it was treated at the time; and if the question is asked, which I have heard more than once propounded, why it passed without opposition in this Chamber, why, according to the record, it was nem. con., the answer is easy, that all disinclined to the measure saw full well that by that careful provision, relieving the United States of all liability, they would hereafter be safe; that there would be no return to them, no call on them, no suggestion of public faith. All that was clearly recognized at the time; and that was the reason why the bill passed without opposition. I had drafted that provision, and I was satisfied that it would hold, and I calmly said to all who spoke to me upon the subject, "It is in the nature of a private bill; it creates a new and grand corporation for a patriotic purpose; let the corporators have their bill; the United States are not in any way involved."

Now let me call attention to another utterance of this able statesman, which I particularly commend to those gentlemen upon this floor who belong to the legal profession:

Every man of business knows that a bill of exchange is often indorsed, "without recourse." I will not give my definition to that phrase, but will read that of Webster's Dictionary: "Without recourse; words sometimes added to the indorsement of a negotiable instrument to protect the indorser from liability to the indorsee and subsequent holders." Here we have indorsee and subsequent holders, but the United States, by the provision to which I have referred, are completely secure against all resort from indorsee or subsequent holder. These corporators took this great business "without recourse" to the United States; and there I stand. "Without recourse." Let them proceed as they began.

In the same debate he again said:

Senators speak of pledges, of conditions. Sir, there is but one pledge in the bill; there is but one real condition. That pledge is that the United States shall not be called upon to pay a dollar; the condition is that our Government is relieved of all responsibility on account of this undertaking, and that is the ruling condition to which all else is subordinate.

In answer to a remark made by Senator Scott, of Pennsylvania, wherein the latter gentleman had said that the "public faith" was involved in the question of the appropriation sought, Mr. Sumner eloquently and truthfully replied:

Now, in the face of that condition, according to his own admission incorporated in the act, he rises day by day in this Chamber and charges us with a breach of public faith. Public faith, sir! Nothing is more beautiful, more sacred, sacrosanct, than the public faith, always to be preserved and never to be invoked with levity; and permit me to say that when my friend invokes it on this occasion it seems more like comedy than truth. Unquestionably the public faith is the other way. The public faith is solemnly pledged in this business to economy and to an absolute abnegation on the part of the United States.

Sir, if one so able, so patriotic, so sincere as the illustrious Senator, whose memory will always be kept green by a grateful people, could thus speak and act, why should we hesitate to offer our opposition to the passage of this bill? If the repeated efforts which have been made by our National Legislature to provide against embarrassing the Government, in this centennial celebration, are to have no consideration at our hands, no weight, no influence upon our conduct now, why, in candor, I would ask, were they ever made? Were they intended simply to allay that spirit of watchful care which otherwise would have been bestowed upon the various bills which have passed relating to the Centennial? Was each measure adopted by Congress a wedge to force an entrance for this appropriation? If so, and I confess that this is the appearance, would not a little more honesty injected into our method of legislation be salutary? Should members of Congress, who under our representative system are the guardians of the people's interest, be less scrupulous in public than in private life? Will not this policy of securing by insidious and indirect means that which we should not and could not accomplish openly and by directness of effort ultimately cause us to forfeit the esteem of a confiding people?

Lands mortgaged may return, and more esteem'd;
But honesty once pawn'd is ne'er redeem'd.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that Congress has been called upon to violate its pledges to the people. A conspicuous instance we have in the matter of the Vienna exposition. An appeal was made to Congress for the passage of a bill authorizing the President to appoint one or more persons to represent the United States at that great exhibition. Several gentlemen of untold wealth and easy grace desired to go. They desired no compensation for their services. They simply wished to be recognized as the "accredited" agents of this country that they might secure social position thereby. They were able and willing—only too willing—to defray their own expenses. A bill authorizing the appointment of commissioners was promptly passed; but lest the Government should in some way be deemed liable to pay what others had voluntarily agreed to pay the bill contained this provision:

Provided, That such appointments shall not impose on this Government any liability for the expense which they may occasion.

This bill was certainly well guarded. If any provision could serve as a protection to the Government against liability, this would. It was emphatic; it was simple; it was without ambiguity. And so the commissioners were appointed by the President. They were duly "accredited." Each had the proud satisfaction of having the appendage "Commissioner of the United States of America to the exposition of agriculture, industry, and fine arts, at Vienna" streaming after his name. They went to Vienna. How the "national honor", was promoted by their going some one other than myself must answer. I know that the commissioners came back, and that an appropriation of $200,000 was made to defray expenses, when this great centennial corporation—taking fresh courage from it, began to fix things for the present assault upon the Treasury, and if I do not mistake the indications it will have to succumb to the invasion.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill is to pass the House, I beg of gentlemen who have it in charge to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, also, That the Government of the United States shall not under any circumstances be liable for any debt or obligation of the United States Centennial Commission or the centennial board of finance, or any payment in addition to the foregoing sum.

It belongs to the same class of safeguards so often inserted in bills, and is a delusion and a snare. The passage of the present bill by this House will be equivalent to saying that such clauses are meaningless, that they bind nobody, and may be swept away as occasion requires like chaff before the wind. Let us not sacrifice our honor by making pledges which we do not intend to keep.

But conceding, Mr. Chairman, that no past assurances of Congress to the people that the Government should not be in any way responsible for the coming exhibition at Philadelphia are entitled to consideration at our hands—which I do not admit as a truthful proposition—and yet there are many reasons, as I believe, why this bill should not be passed. It calls for a large sum of money. One can hardly help astonishment at hearing gentlemen call the amount of money asked for as a "poor, pitiful sum," and they wonder, sir, how can we find it in our generous natures to deny this corporation the "poor, pitiful sum" of $1,500,000! If the amount is so insignificant, there is no good reason why such stupendous efforts should be made to get it. It ought to be raised without impeding the business of Congress. If it is a large sum of money—which we all know—then I insist that this Government is in no condition now to give it. It is quite common in the discussions here to quote largely from the Holy Bible. In this way members have a chance to show their familiarity with that good book. I am not as conversant with it as I should be, but I sometimes read it, and I trust not without profit. I hold in my hand Levinski's Bible. It is a Jewish Bible—my landlord is a Jew—and I trust it will be considered good authority among the Gentiles of this House. In King Solomon's song of love I find the following beautiful words:

For everything there is a season; and a proper time is for every pursuit under the heavens. There is a time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up what hath been planted; a time to kill and a time to heal—

This last expression I commend to those who want to fight over anew the war of the rebellion—

A time to break down, and a time to build up; a time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance; a time to throw away stones, and a time to gather up stones; a time to embrace, and a time to be far from embracing; a time to seek, and a time to let things be lost; a time to keep, and a time to throw away; a time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silent, and a time to speak; a time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace.

And let me add, a "time" to make large expenditures of money, but this is not the occasion nor is it the "time" for it. Just now our people are indeed passing through a fearful ordeal. Industries are prostrate, business languishes, confidence is shaken, dissatisfaction is widespread at our present monetary system; floods and drought and grasshoppers and hostile savages have reduced thousands of our people to poverty; millions of acres of public lands have been wrested from the grasp of honest tillers of the soil to enrich the coffers of monopolies; frauds and peculations of Government officials have resulted in almost depleting our Treasury; high public functionaries have been holding carnivals of rejoicing as salaries have been increased and labor robbed of its just rewards. Money and lands and every species of securities have been lavishly bestowed with a view to opening up commerce between the States and with foreign countries by means of railway communication, and yet it may truthfully be said that we have no real competing lines of railroad!

No, Mr. Chairman, this is not the time for the Government of the United States to expend the people's money thoughtlessly, carelessly, lavishly upon this centennial jubilee. Rather should we heed the voice of a tax-ridden people who ask for reform in our legislation; for stricter honesty on the part of their servants, whom we are; for the curtailment of unnecessary expenditures in all the departments of the Government; and generally such legislation as will revive the drooping hopes of the people and re-establish in their hearts confidence in the wisdom of our laws and the integrity of those who may make and administer them.

Mr. Chairman, I make no pretensions to prophecy, but let me predict that when you open the door for this appropriation you will be besieged again and again for other appropriations to close up the indebtedness of this great private corporation. The champions of this bill say not; but in the light of past transactions to which I have called the attention of this House how deeply will this asseveration impress you?

The various Departments of the Government have to be provided with funds with which to make suitable displays at Philadelphia. The design, I believe, is to exhibit our Patent Office there; also the Smithsonian Institution, with its innumerable relics of barbarism and of civilization. The Army and Navy must be provided for. That useful, and I may say truly indispensable, institution the Department of Agriculture should be fairly and fully represented there also. Large sums of money will be yet required to do this. A project is on foot, too, to gather up the stalwart braves and dusky maidens from the various Indian tribes and take them to the Centennial, with which to gratify curiously inclined foreigners who may wish to see the amiable creatures with whom we continually make treaties for the acquisition of territory and for friendly relations in the same manner and with the same diplomatic dignity which we manifest in our dealings with the powers on the other side of the water. For this last purpose $100,000, I am informed, will be asked of us; and, having once "recognized" the Centennial by voting for this bill, will not our "honor" be sullied if we refuse to allow it? Already the enterprising agents of the Government are penetrating the prairie fastnesses, the jungles, and cañons of New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, and wherever else the best specimens of the American hair-lifter can be found to snatch him from his "happy hunting-grounds" for centennial purposes. Those gentlemen whose pockets are so plethoric of currency that they are pleased to call a million and a half of dollars a "poor, pitiful sum" will have abundant opportunity of making it respectable before they get through with this business.

And still again, Mr. Chairman, let me call your attention to another matter. I allude now to the various relief bills which are pending in the House. Hundreds of people having just claims are humbly asking, begging Congress to do justice by them and enable them to buy bread for themselves and families. In many instances claims fairly brimming over with equities by some technical ruling of the Departments have been refused payment; and relief, if it comes at all, must be given by us. From my own State and district there are many such. Soldiers and widows and orphans of soldiers make up the larger number. They are asking for pensions, for compensation for property lost during the war, for back-pay refused, because of the fault or neglect of some mustering-in or mustering-out officer of the Army, and for all manner of equitable relief. If this bill is passed I expect to hear gentlemen who are fairly ecstatic in the support of it rising in their places and solemnly opposing these claims on economical grounds. We will then be told that we should "retrench," "reform," and be careful about establishing "bad precedents." O, how rigorously they will guard the money remaining in the Treasury! How eloquently, how earnestly some of these gentlemen will insist that "not a dollar" should be taken of the people's money except in cases where the expenditure is "absolutely necessary." To-day we "are a great nation," mighty and rich, abundant in resources; to-morrow we will be as poor as Don Quixote's celebrated Rosinante. Why not, Mr. Chairman, commence to-day the good work of retrenchment? Why not now usher in the era of genuine reform and vote this bill down?

Mr. Chairman, much has been said in this discussion about the gallant soldiers whose strong arms, bravery, and devotion to principle have made it possible for us to have a Fourth of July to celebrate. I like to hear such talk. We can never say too much in favor of those who imperiled their lives to save the country which we all profess to love. I wish that the brave defenders of our flag could all go, and take their sweethearts, wives, and babies with them to Philadelphia. I know they would enjoy it; and they richly deserve an opportunity to participate in that national and international jubilee which will take place at the noble old city of Philadelphia, commencing May 10, (no postponement even if this bill should be defeated.) Many of them will be there; many will not be able to be. Many more could attend if, instead of passing buncombe resolutions, with a view to tickle their pride and stir up and imbitter their hates against those whom they fought and conquered, this great Government would do justice by them in a suitable recognition of the sacrifices and hardships voluntarily endured to save the nation's life. Mr. Chairman, it is fresh in the memory of us all that the last Congress passed the bill to equalize the bounties of the Union soldiers in the late war. We know, too, that the President vetoed it, and are not forgetful either that his action was attempted to be justified on the ground that we were not able then to take upon ourselves the additional burden which would be imposed upon us. But in this centennial year, with our condition far less prosperous, we can vote away millions of dollars unnecessary to be expended without apparently giving a thought to the depressed condition of the people. But, sir, my voice and vote shall not be so recorded. I know full well the patriotism of those who sent me here. I know equally well that with the many reverses of the past few years how completely unprepared are they for public or private extravagances. My constituency are as noble and generous, as industrious and intelligent, as frugal and honest, as lofty in patriotism, as gallant in war, as merciful in peace as that of any member upon this floor. But, sir, in the exigencies of the present hour they demand honesty and fair dealing, and insist upon the most rigid economy; and not until I cease to be honored through their suffrages by a seat in this Hall will I suffer their demands to go unheeded by me.

In what I have said, Mr. Chairman, I hope I shall not be construed as opposing the centennial celebration. My soul is in union with every proper effort to make it a grand success; and if we are to believe the utterances of honorable gentlemen who have advocated the bill, as to the blaze of enthusiasm among the people of the whole country, and of the growing interest manifested in the coming great event, all doubts about the ability of the board of Commissioners to raise the necessary funds to carry out the programme adopted, must be at once dispelled. Poor as are the citizens of my State, they have willingly given, and will continue to give of their limited means what they can to aid the enterprise. Kansas has already, through her Legislature, made an appropriation to enable that growing young member of our national sisterhood to be properly represented. The governor has, in his recent message, recommended a still further appropriation for that purpose. As far as we are able to do it, the wonderful resources of that plucky young Commonwealth will be made manifest at the Centennial. With the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] who has spoken so feelingly for this measure, I want peace. Alike with the people of his State, my people want peace. They want an enduring, substantial peace. They want to forget the incidents of the terrible, gory strife which brought only misery and estrangement, as they have forgiven those lately in arms against us, who sincerely revere the underlying principles of our Government, and are willing to rally once more around the cherished emblem of our nationality. Yes, sir, the whole country asks, begs, demands, prays, and sighs for peace.

> Peace, greatness best becomes. Calm pow'r doth guide
> With a far more imperious stateliness,
> Than all the swords of violence can do;
> And easier gains those ends she tends unto.

And let me say that I am not without hope that this great movement will largely contribute to the restoration of that peace, that blessed tranquillity that so appropriately becomes this glorious land of liberty.

In conclusion let me remark again with reference to the centennial board in the language of Mr. Sumner, "Let them proceed as they began." Let this great exposition be carried on by the free-will offerings, the spontaneous contributions of the people of this populous and powerful nation. An appropriation by Congress now would be a confession that the masses were lacking in sympathy for the movement, and that their uninstructed representatives were obliged by force of legislation to compel indirectly the people to pay money which they voluntarily refuse to bestow in aid of this Centennial movement.

Mr. LAMAR. It is only within the last few moments that I have consented to participate in this debate, although I have given the subject that calm and earnest reflection which its importance demands. I have listened with riveted attention to the arguments of gentlemen upon the other side controverting the constitutional power of this body to pass this measure. While I perhaps am unable to point out the fallacy which I think lurks in their reasoning, it has failed to bring me to the conclusion which they have reached. I concur with them in the importance and gravity of the constitutional aspect of this question. Profoundly conscious of the importance of this measure, anxious for its success, painfully apprehensive of the misconstructions and unhappy influences which its defeat may produce, yet if I thought it even constructively violated the Constitution of my country I would vote against it.

I agree with the gentlemen that the shaping of the destiny of this country lies in the supremacy of its organic law and its inviolability. Every act of this Government which does not bring around it the clear and complete sanction of that instrument is a lawless act, and establishes a precedent which if allowed to recur would result in the destruction of constitutional government and constitutional liberty.

Believing this, I have attempted to give full consideration to the argument which impugns the constitutionality of this measure. I desire here to say that I concur in many of the canons of constitutional construction which gentlemen have laid down. I believe that this is a Government of limited powers, and that it can exercise no power whatever or do any act which the Constitution does not expressly authorize, or which is not necessary to the execution of some expressly granted power.

I also concur in the view of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] that that clause which speaks of the common defense and general welfare contains no substantive or affirmative grant of power to Congress. I go further than the gentleman from Virginia. In my opinion that clause is a limitation, is a restriction upon the powers which are grouped around it, and it means that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c., only for the objects therein prescribed—the common defense and general welfare. The powers conferred are thus limited, and the Government is prohibited from doing the acts therein enumerated for any other purposes than those of the common defense and the general welfare.

While I hold these views as strictly as my friend from Virginia and other gentlemen upon this floor, I do not think they touch the real issue of this controversy. In attempting to demonstrate the power of Congress to act upon this measure it is not my purpose to go into the question whether the Constitution of the United States originated from a compact between the several States as independent sovereignties or whether it emanated from the will of the American people as one vast indivisible sovereign society and community. I say that question is not involved. Whether it originated in the one or the other, the Constitution is the supreme law of the land in either event; the divisions of power are the same, the distribution of political functions in our system between the States and the Federal Government and between the different departments of the latter is all the same upon either theory; and the discussion of the theory upon this question is sterile in its uses and fatal in its abuses. The question before us has relation only to the existence and residence of this power, whatever may have been the origin of the Constitution.

There is one point upon which I presume there can be no difference of opinion; that is, that there is one division of delegated powers to this Government which is broad and marked unmistakably. It is like some lofty mountain which has two water-sheds, indivisibly connected and yet sloping in opposite directions. One is the side that looks to internal administration and the other is the side which looks to external relations. Now all the principles which my friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has laid down relate to internal administration. Nearly all the powers under this system for internal affairs are given by the Constitution, or, if the gentlemen prefers the expression as I do, are reserved under it to the States singly and severally.

All matters affecting individuals or citizens in their relations within the States concerning all private rights, personal security, and liberty, the enforcement of contracts, the tenure of real property, the devolution of estates, real or personal, marriage dower, inheritance, the jurisdiction of private wrongs, and the supervision of acts of violence, all these are conferred upon the States in their separate character. The powers given to the Federal Government on that side are but few and general, tending to the regulation of commerce between the States, and the questions growing out of interstate communication.

But, sir, when you turn to the other side of the Constitution you see a phenomenon of an entirely different character. You see there (whether the United States be a nation or be a body of States united under a compact) that all the political authority of our system, the entire sovereignty of this country in all its plenitude, is conferred upon the Federal Government. Whether you consider that Government an agent or whether you consider it a supreme power makes no difference. The powers of the entire political organization in its foreign relations are in the Federal Government, and the States have either divested themselves or have been divested of every single attribute of government in their relations to foreign powers or in any extraterritorial relation whatever. Is it not true, sir? In that direction they do not possess, and have never under this Constitution exercised, a single power of a sovereign State.

Not a State has had a flag, which is one muniment of sovereignty recognized by foreign nations. They have never made a treaty. They have had no control over foreign commerce or interstate commerce. They cannot coin money or establish a post-office; they cannot send or receive embassadors or enter into an agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power. Sir, they have not as full a measure of power over their external affairs this day as the colonies of Great Britain in Canada or Australia, which did not revolt; for these can tax the commodities of foreign countries and even those of the parent country itself.

Here is the condition of these States in their external relationship—divested of all sovereignty. In connection with this I will mention one single fact that has been brought to my attention by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] Long ago the State of Vermont passed a law which looked to the extradition, or rather the intradition, of fugitives from justice from Canada. The law was that these fugitives should be taken by the authority of the State and carried to the line where they would be delivered over to the Canadian authorities. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that that law of Vermont was unconstitutional, because it partook of the nature of a compact; it was something like an alliance, something involving a reciprocal understanding between that State and a foreign state, a jurisdiction of which the States were divested or had divested themselves. On the other hand, all the sovereignty, by the Constitution strictly construed, has been transferred to this Federal Government; and the specifications of power in this connection which are found in that instrument have reference to the distribution of power between the different departments of the Federal Government, reserving none whatever to the States.

Mr. REA rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair recognizes me, I yield my time to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to rule that there is no power under the order of the House——

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not ask for an extension of the gentleman's time. I asked the Chair to recognize me as having the floor, that I might yield my time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will be allowed to proceed by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to rule that under the order of debate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. REA] would be entitled to the floor. He regrets that it is not within his power to give the gentleman from Mississippi, whom we all desire to hear, an opportunity to finish his remarks.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Cannot the gentleman from Mississippi proceed by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri can yield to the gentleman from Mississippi. That is the only manner in which it can be arranged.

Mr. LAMAR. I do not wish to take the time of other gentlemen if I may be permitted to write out my remarks.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield his time, I will yield to him when I obtain the floor.

Mr. REA. If I do not lose my right to speak hereafter, I yield my time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LAMAR. In confirmation of the argument just submitted, I quote from an authority pronounced by no less a man than John Stuart Mill, to be one of the most advanced thinkers of the nineteenth century upon subjects of political philosophy. I read from Mr. Calhoun's work upon government, which sustains precisely the view I have been trying to present upon this subject. I omit his discussion of the powers which belong to the States in their sovereign capacity—for this is a question with which we have nothing to do here; because whether the Government originated in compact or otherwise does not affect practical administration in any way. Some of the strictest constructionists I have known were advocates of the national theory, while the most latitudinarian and liberal constructionists have been the advocates of the compact theory. Mr. Calhoun proceeds to say:

> This leading principle embraced two great divisions of power which may be said to comprehend all or nearly all the delegated powers, either directly or as a means to carry them into execution.

Now I ask attention to the next paragraph:

> One of them—

> embraces all the powers appertaining to the relations of the States with the rest of the world, called their foreign relations; and the other, of an internal character, embraces such as appertain to the exterior relations of the States with each other. It is clear that both come within the leading principle, as each is of a description which the States, in their separate character, are either incompetent to exercise at all, or if competent, to exercise consistently with their mutual peace, safety, and prosperity. Indeed, so strong and universal has this opinion been, in reference to the powers appertaining to their foreign relations, that from the Declaration of Independence to the present time, in all the changes through which they have passed, the Union has had exclusive charge of this great division of powers. To the rest of the world the States composing this Union are now and ever have been known in no other than their united, confederated character. Abroad—to the rest of the world—they are but one. It is only at home, in their interior relations, that they are many; and it is to this twofold aspect that their motto, E pluribus unum, appropriately and emphatically applies.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question arises with this sovereignty in the hands of this Federal Government in utmost possible extent can gentlemen say there is constitutional incompeteney in the Congress of the United States to invite the commissioners of foreign countries to bring over here articles of commerce, art, and industry for international exhibition, and for the advancement of commerce, science, art, and the progress of mankind? Sir, was it unconstitutional in the President to give the invitations which this law authorized and invoked him to make? If not, the power is clear and unquestionable to appropriate the means for this purpose.

My friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] in giving the grounds for several acts which constitute precedents in the line of this legislation, uses this language:

> The exploration of the Polar Sea is legitimate either under the power to provide and maintain a navy, or the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Mr. Chairman, is an exploration in the Polar seas not rather a greater strain upon that grant—exploring the Polar seas for some contingent amelioration of commerce in the future—than this act which brings the commerce of the world to our own shores and which must result not only in its regulation, but its improvement and advancement all over the world?

Well, sir, I therefore am in favor of this measure upon the clear indisputable ground of constitutional jurisdiction, and I have the right to look around and see what the benefits are which the exercise of this established jurisdiction will produce. I do not agree, however, with the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that this Constitution of the United States, this charter of our Union, the rule of its destiny and the law of its being, is an unintelligible enigma. I must say that it is a perilous doctrine for gentlemen representing New England States to advocate upon this floor. I tell you the ground of political power in this country is shifting, and a day may come when their only reliance will be upon these constitutional guarantees.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Maine is not in his seat. I understood him to say that this enigma was not in the Constitution, but in reference to certain interpretations of the Constitution given by gentlemen on this floor

Mr. LAMAR. His expression was that "the Constitution is an enigma."

Mr. HOAR. He referred to the various constructions of the Constitution.

Mr. LAMAR. Upon the gentleman's representation, then, of what he did say, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] would have the right to call the Bible an enigma on account of the various constructions of its inspired oracles. [Laughter.] It is only by virtue of constitutional guarantees that New England to-day stands in this great powerful Government, with but three millions of population, possessing six times as much positive and affirmative power as the State of New York with four millions. Where does she get it? Where, except by the guarantees of the Constitution? And, sir, if the people of this country were to rise up in their might and the States unanimously, saving only herself, were to demand that Maine should be stricken from her equal right of representation in the United States, what would the gentleman from Maine do but hold up this Constitution, not as an enigma, but as a clear, radiant shield which should protect the sovereignty of his State? [Applause.] Standing upon that simple guarantee, she would be upon a rock and an earthquake could not shake her.

An enigma, sir! Are the three constitutional amendments adopted and ratified by the States of this Union enigmas?—these amendments which clothed in the twinkling of an eye four millions of people, whose immemorial condition had been that of domestic servitude, with freedom, with citizenship, with suffrage, and with participation in American sovereignty! It was no enigma, but a grand, august, imposing reality. I could go on, sir, with these illustrations, but I must speak of some of the benefits which result from the exercise of this power.

The motive which prompts me is one which has been the law of my career since I have been in Congress. It is my desire to see the pacification of these sections—to see my people of the South restored to the proud position of dignity and equality in this Union to which under the Constitution they are entitled. And to do that it is necessary that these Representatives of the North, and if not they then their constituencies, the people of the North, should become satisfied of the longing and desire of our people to live with them in peace and perpetuity in a restored and fraternal Union. Before that cherished purpose and inspiration all others with me sink into insignificance. [Applause.]

I see I have the attention of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who in his jealous surveillance of the conduct of our newly enfranchised members from the South seemed to object both to their mode of gesticulation and the poise of their head while they were in the heat of argument. He spoke, sir—and I was pained at the allusion—of Preston Brooks. Mr. Chairman, I shall not even make an inquiry as to the object of that allusion. I will not believe, sir, and certainly will not express the belief, that there lurked one motive in his breast less pure than patriotic love for the whole country. But the inevitable effect of the taunt was, I tell him, to excite passion, to inflame animosity, and to madden the hatred of sectionalism. Sir, the gentleman, unconsciously to himself doubtless, gravitated into a plagiarism. It was not the first time that this taunt has been contemptuously hurled. Another distinguished gentleman flung it upon another distinguished occasion, when the object of it was not a southern but a northern man. Sir, when Charles Sumner stood up for amnesty, for concord, and for the equal rights of all, this same taunt was hurled at him from a distinguished source; and he was told that he was associating with secessionists, with the men who upheld and sustained Preston Brooks in his brutal assault and attempt to commit murder upon him. Sir, I trust the gentleman from New York will allow me—not to make a reply to his jeer but to repeat to him the words of Charles Sumner, as if the spirit of that great philanthropist, that statesman, that sympathizer with human rights and human sorrow were here present in my place. Here, sir, is what Mr. Sumner said as to that:

> You entirely misunderstand me when you introduce an incident of the past, and build on it an argument why I should not support Horace Greeley. What has Preston Brooks to do with the presidential election?

And what, sir, has he to do with this discussion?

> Never while a sufferer did any one hear me speak of [him] in unkindness. And now, after the lapse of more than half a generation I will not unite with you in dragging him from the grave where he sleeps to aggravate the passions of political conflict and arrest the longing for concord. And here is the essential difference between you and me at this juncture. I seize the opportunity to make the equal rights of all secure through peace and reconciliation. But this infinite boon you would postpone. Seven years have passed since we laid aside our arms, but unhappily, during all this period, there has been a hostile spirit toward each other, while the rights of our colored fellow-citizens have been in perpetual question. Seven years mark a natural period of human life. Should not the spirit be changed with the body? Can we not after seven years commence new life, especially when those once our foes repeat the saying, "Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

[Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, rose.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman add to the grace and magnanimity which he has hitherto extended to us the further boon of allowing me to conclude my remarks?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LAMAR. I will not say that on account of these patriotic utterances, but certainly after them and in spite of them and for having proposed to strike from our national banners and the archives of our country the records which would assail the sensibilities of his conquered brethren, Charles Sumner was deposed from the chairmanship of an important committee, the honorable position he had maintained for so many years, by the men whose party he had built up, and was censured by the Legislature of his own Commonwealth in a joint resolution. And, sir, those who knew him best knew that, with his noble and lofty spirit, such an act inflicted upon him a martyrdom whose agony was greater than that which any personal assault could give. It was the grief of his life, only alleviated by the magnanimous act of another Legislature of the same State when it obliterated from its records this assault upon his sensibilities and this imputation upon his honor.

Now, sir, I might advocate this scheme simply because it comes up in the spirit which this great man expressed, the spirit of peace and conciliation; and I believe, sir, that it will be carried out. I do not believe that this measure will be defeated. It is, sir, something like an image of the feelings of our people which demand that the alienation hitherto existing between the two sections of the Union shall no longer disturb the peace and the happiness of the American Republic, nor obstruct their prosperity and greatness and glory. I say "hitherto existing," for I do not believe that this alienation any longer exists, and I do believe that if each of the two sections could be brought to see and understand the inward feeling and aspiration of the other, the real fact would be developed that at no period since the inauguration of Mr. Jefferson have the entire body of the American people been animated by such a universal and common sentiment in favor of harmony and fraternal unison, or by a purer, intenser, broader, and more universal patriotism.

I know, sir, that this sentiment, this aspiration has not found full expression and development here in this Hall. It has been kept under and stifled by the strong net-work of an intolerant political organization, and its voice unheeded amid the clamors of impassioned partisans. But in the political as well as in the natural world the agencies which are the most powerful are not the noisiest. Violence, passion, fanaticism, and animosity can always find voice and rend the air with their factious clamors, while deep and earnest conviction lies unspoken in the heart of a people. The currents of passion and of feeling may flow hither and thither under extraneous influences and forces, like the dash and roar of waves lashed to fury by the storm, while the great sea, the unsounded depths of a common humanity, a common hope, a common interest, and a common patriotism, lie voiceless but all mighty beneath. [Much applause.]

Mr. REA. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I had no intention of claiming the time of this committee in the discussion of the important bill now before it. But, sir, I have conceived that it is proper that the State which I represent in part upon this floor should be heard in reference to this appropriation—the fifth State, sir, in the Union in population and great in wealth and resources. I know, Mr. Chairman, that the bill before the committee is one of great importance; it is important because it pertains to the centennial celebration of the anniversary of American Independence; it is important because of the amount it is proposed to be levied upon an overtaxed people; it is important because of the doubtful constitutional power of Congress to make the appropriation.

I do not care, Mr. Chairman, to enter into the discussion of the constitutionality of this bill; but I am one of the members upon this floor who do not believe that the Constitution grants to Congress the right and power to make this appropriation. And if I had no other evidence to make me believe thus there would be sufficient evidence in the diverse opinions that have been urged by gentlemen as to the constitutional right to make it by distinguished gentlemen who represent and favor this bill. Gentlemen with ability, with learning, and research have entered the field of the Constitution to find a provision in the Constitution to authorize the passage of this bill. One distinguished gentleman says that it is only to be found in the power to make treaties; others say it is not to be found there, but that it is to be found in the power to provide for the general welfare of the country; others say that it is not within either the treaty-making power or the power to provide for the general welfare, but is to be found in the power to regulate commerce. Now, sir, when able gentlemen differ so much as to the part of the Constitution that authorizes this measure I ask you if it is not at least a doubtful authority. And it being at least of doubtful authority, I, sir, shall cast my vote in favor of the heavily-taxed people and give the benefit of that doubt to that people.

Mr. Chairman, no gentleman on this floor desires more than I do to see the centennial anniversary celebrated. No man desires more than I to see the people of the United States celebrate the centennial anniversary with the spirit that they should. No people desire it more than the people of the State that I in part represent upon this floor, and it is proper and patriotic that it should be so celebrated.

A great deal has been said in reference to peace and the future prosperity of the country, and that this measure will be for the interest of that peace and prosperity, and in the interest of the final reconciliation of our country and the obliteration of all ill-feeling growing out of the troubles in which we have been engaged. I desire to say, in order that the House may not misunderstand the feelings of the representatives of my State who will vote against this bill, that we represent a people who have faith in the Union, a faith which has probably been tried more than in any other State. Missouri lies midway between the East and the West, and midway between the North and the South, occupying a central position in this great Republic. One portion of its people, and among them myself, and some other of my distinguished colleagues on this floor, felt it our duty in the late war to follow the flag of the Union. Others, and among them, also, some of my distinguished colleagues, doubtless honest and sincere in their convictions, felt it their duty to follow a different flag. They did so; but, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the people of Missouri have not waited for the centennial year to make friends. No, sir! The men engaged in that struggle in Missouri have already become friends and obliterated from its organic law, by a constitution lately adopted, all relics of the late war by an almost unanimous vote. And not only that, but while the members from that State have in times past in a time of trouble been divided they are friends to-day. They represent a people who, during the late war, were divided into hostile armies against each other, but they are to-day friends, and by the adoption almost unanimously of the recently adopted constitution have not only obliterated all relics of the late war, but demonstrated the fact that those who were lately enemies can be friends and citizens of one common country. And they have not only done that, but they have sought peace and reconciliation. And the representatives from my State a few days ago showed that, however much they were divided in the war, they are now friends, and desire peace and good-will in voting solidly on this floor for universal amnesty and universal peace forever.

Mr. Chairman, I take into consideration that the aggregate yearly taxes of the American people to-day are about equal to the annual increase of the wealth of the nation. I feel that I should not, in the exercise of at least doubtful constitutional power to pass this bill while the people are crushed with a burden of debt, pile upon the mountain of taxation already resting upon them without their consent the sum of $1,500,000.

Mr. PAGE. I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, to make any remarks upon this bill, but I desire to yield the floor to the chairman of the Centennial Committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I desire a vote on the amendment I offered the other day.

Mr. HOPKINS. Withdraw it, and I will give you an opportunity to offer it in the House, where you can have a vote upon it.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. Very well.

Mr. HOUSE. I would like to inquire if it is in order for the committee to rise and report the bill while any member desires to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The Chair, however, understands that it is the intention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield for the offering of amendments when the bill is reported to the House. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. HOUSE. It is.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I do not understand that this bill has been considered by sections, and after the general debate is closed the bill must be considered by sections. I have myself no amendments to offer, but I understand that other gentlemen desire to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment before the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of ascertaining the views of the committee, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; and upon that motion I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. HOPKINS were appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and it is whether the effect of this motion is not the same as a motion to lay on the table in the House?

Mr. HOPKINS. Let that be understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion effectually kills the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I request the Chair to restate the effect of the motion, so that all the members of the House may understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will restate it. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, the effect of which is substantially to defeat the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 101, noes 128.

So Mr. HOLMAN'S motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move to amend the bill by striking out the words "share equally with the holders of the said centennial stock, and a like percentage thereon be paid into the Treasury of the United States as may be paid to the holders of the said stock," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "to be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock." The proviso, as amended, will then read:

Provided, That in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the centennial board of finance for the payment of its debts, as provided for by the tenth section of the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said centennial board of finance, the appropriation hereinbefore made shall be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock.

The object of this amendment is to provide that, if there should be a dividend when this exhibition is over, the United States shall come in as a preferred creditor, instead of sharing equally, as this bill now provides, with the stockholders of this corporation. In other words, the United States having made a voluntary contribution, as this bill provides, we shall be first entitled to have the people's money back before any of it goes into the pockets of private individuals as a dividend.

Before I sit down I desire to say that, while I am anxious for the full success of this centennial exhibition, at the same time I regard this bill as simply a proposition to place in the treasury of the finance board $1,500,000 to be divided among the stockholders after this exhibition is completed. If we pass this bill they will have $1,500,000 more to divide; if we do not pass it, they will have $1,500,000 less.

We have farmed out this exhibition to a corporation which is rich enough to pay its own way and is to receive all the advantages and receipts of the exhibition.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of obtaining an order of the House to close debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have said all I desire.

Mr. HOPKINS. There may be a dozen other amendments offered and debated.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules each amendment is entitled to be debated only five minutes for and five minutes against.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House cannot limit debate so as to cut off the right to amend, except by a suspension of the rules, which can be had only on Monday.

Mr. RANDALL. We can cut off debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. The five-minute debate on amendments——

Mr. BLAINE. The House can cut that off by a majority vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the House cannot cut off the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. The House can cut off the discussion. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOOD, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 124) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic and manufacture;

An act (S. No. 225) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased;

An act (S. 252) donating the military road running from Astoria, Oregon, to Salem, in that State, to the several counties through which it passes; and

An act (S. No. 305) to change the location of the consulates at Aix-la-Chapelle and at Omoa and Truxillo.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. LUCKEY, his Private Secretary.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence; and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the bill be limited to one minute.

Mr. MILLS. Is it intended by that motion to cut off amendment?

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to; and the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WOOD, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending bill is limited to one minute. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] is entitled to the floor, he having obtained it and yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] for the motion that the committee rise. [After a pause.] The time of that gentleman has expired. [Laughter.] The pending question is upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was adopted; there being—ayes 116, noes 99.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the following amendment which is acceptable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HOPKINS.]

SEC. 2. That after the passage of this act the governor of the State of Texas may nominate two citizens of said State for commissioners to the President of the United States in lieu of those now acting under former appointment; and it shall be the duty of the President, on receipt of such nominations from the governor of Texas, to appoint the persons so nominated for commissioners for said State, and upon said appointments being made the officers now acting shall be relieved from further duty.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this amendment is not germane to the bill. The bill proposes to appropriate money for the purpose of a centennial celebration. This amendment relates to the constitution of a corporation.

Mr. BANKS. It relates to a former act.

Mr. HURLBUT. Another and a different law.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order is well taken. The bill proposes an appropriation for a particular purpose, while this amendment is entirely new legislation.

Mr. HOUSE. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Provided, That the sum of $100,000 of the amount hereby appropriated shall be set apart for and, so far as may be necessary, expended in payment of all terminal charges on articles which are the natural growth or production of any State or Territory of the United States, the same to be ratably divided, for the purpose aforesaid, among the States and Territories placing said articles on exhibition; and should a balance remain after the payment of all said charges, the same shall be paid to the centennial board of finance under the regulations prescribed in this bill.

I desire in a few words to explain this amendment.

Several MEMBERS. No debate is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I offer the following amendment, which I believe meets the approval of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HOPKINS:]

SEC. 2. That the money by this act appropriated shall be paid to the treasurer of the centennial board of finance only after he and the president of the board shall have executed a bond in the sum of $500,000 to the United States with sufficient security to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the safe-keeping and faithful disbursement of the sum hereby appropriated.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is perfectly satisfactory. I have no objection to accepting it.

Mr. BANKS. There is no objection to the amendment; but the chairman of the committee has no power to accept it.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Provided, That entrance to the centennial grounds and exhibition shall be free on the 4th day of July, 1876, and also on each and every Thursday during the continuance of the said centennial exposition; and no fee shall be demanded or accepted from any person or persons for the privilege of entering upon and viewing the said centennial grounds and exhibition, or any part thereof, on the day or days herein specified.

I do not wish to make any remarks. I submit this amendment to a vote of the committee.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I move to amend by striking out after the word "million," in the third line, the words "five hundred thousand," so as to make the amount of the appropriation $1,000,000.

The amendment was not agreed to, there being—ayes 107, noes 155.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to withdraw his point of order on the amendment which I offered. That proposition meets the approval of the gentlemen who have charge of this bill. If gentlemen on that side will hear me, (and a number of them have made speeches while I have not said anything on this question,) I would like to say that my State desires to be represented at the Centennial; but she will not be while she has as her two commissioners those who have already been appointed as representative men of Texas.

Mr. GARFIELD. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw the point of order, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has charge of the bill does not object to the amendment. If the gentleman does not withdraw the point of order, I desire to discuss it. I want to know under what rule the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the House is now in Committee of the Whole upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLS. But it is not an appropriation bill in pursuance of existing law. It is an original bill proposing to appropriate a certain amount of money for the first time; and any amendment which is germane to the original proposition for a centennial celebration ought, it seems to me, to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled on the point.

Mr. MILLS. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is too late. Business has transpired since.

Mr. BANKS. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Texas that he can bring in an independent bill if he desires to do so. His amendment, however, is not germane to this proposition. He cannot bring in an amendment concerning the appointment of commissioners.

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman who has charge of the bill has no objection, why, then, is objection urged over there? My amendment can do no harm.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. MILLS. No; I withdraw it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments which have been adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOOD, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. JOYCE. I rise to ask leave of the House to print some remarks which, owing to indisposition, I was prevented from delivering on the floor.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. BOONE. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to print in the RECORD some remarks in explanation of my vote on this question.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I am similarly situated to the gentleman from Kentucky, and ask for the same privilege to print some remarks in the RECORD in explanation of my vote on the pending bill.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some remarks on this centennial bill.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] who reported this bill is entitled to an hour in closing debate, and he can have that hour after the main question has been ordered just as well as before. We had better, I think, take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be now put.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] who reported the bill is entitled to one hour to close the debate.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield for twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.]

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, if the measure presented by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania and now under consideration by the House was one of ordinary moment and significance in the usual routine of legislative business, I should not perhaps have given it my sanction by even recording my vote in the affirmative, and I certainly should not have occupied the floor for a single moment to speak in its advocacy.

Educated in a political school which teaches a careful guardianship of the public treasury and a close observance of the limits fixed by organic law within which official functions may be exercised, I should with very great reluctance give my consent to any appropriation of public moneys, however earnestly sought and however trifling the amount, that was not manifestly demanded by some public want and clearly warranted by some written law.

But there sometimes arises in the progress of legislation an exigency new and unexpected, having no precedent in the record of former enactments, which makes it the duty of the legislator to disregard the popular lessons of political economy, the teachings of party tradition, and conform his action to the requirements of the occasion, being restricted alone in the exercise of his discretion by the stern mandate of the Constitution and laws of his country.

In my judgment, sir, such an emergency now confronts us. An occasion is now presented when the members of this body may turn aside somewhat from the channel of past legislation and pursue a course not perhaps to their minds pointed out by the land-marks which have heretofore guided them, and rely upon their own instinctive convictions of duty and the spirit, if not the letter, of the law for sanction and approval.

But after having giving this measure a careful consideration for many days, I have reached the conclusion that the objections to its passage do not arise from want of an abundant number of precedents nor from any want of lawful authority to enact it, but they spring, if any valid ones exist, from the doubtful propriety of the step.

I have listened with great interest and pleasure to the eloquent and cogent arguments of many of the most distinguished gentlemen upon this floor against the passage of this bill, and though the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COCHRANE,] as well as my able colleague, [Mr. CALDWELL,] have presented with great force and ability the obstructions thrown in the way of legislation of this kind by organic law, yet they have not impressed me with the apprehension that I shall in any way violate the Constitution of the country by giving it my support.

The constitutional objections urged to the passage of this bill by the gentlemen who have spoken against it are but the echo of what has been said in this Hall hundreds of times before upon occasions similar to this, and the records of Congress show that such objections have been as often disregarded.

The history of our past legislation abounds with instances in which money has been appropriated under the authority of that clause of the Constitution which not only confers the power, but makes it the duty of Congress to provide for the public welfare. A memorable one now occurs to my mind, and I refer to it very briefly for the reason that it was largely participated in by two of the most distinguished statesmen our country has ever produced, and to whose teachings upon constitutional limitations the gentlemen upon the other side of the question have so often appealed in support of their argument. In the beginning of the present century our southern gateway to the ocean, where now sits the rich and beautiful queen city of the South, as well as all that vast region of country extending from the Gulf far up the shores of the Mississippi belonged to a foreign government; and though our population was not then eight millions, and though we already had an extent of territory greater than almost any other nation of the world, the larger portion of which was a wilderness unoccupied by civilized men, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and the other statesmen of that day concluded that the public welfare required the acquisition of Louisiana, and they did not seem to be of opinion that it was forbidden by any provision of the Constitution.

The gentlemen who have spoken so eloquently against this bill will scarcely be able to convince many people at the present day that the purchase of Louisiana was either unconstitutional or unwise. The Sage of Monticello and the Father of the Constitution were unfortunate witnesses for the gentlemen, for, however their utterances and writings may be construed, their actions certainly did not conform to the constitutional standard by which gentlemen of the opposition propose to be governed. But to my mind, sir, no question of constitutional law is presented by any feature of this bill. The only question before the House is one of the expediency and propriety of exercising in this particular case a power clearly given to Congress by the Constitution; and when we are once satisfied that the public good and general welfare of the country require this appropriation, the constitutional opposition conjured up by the gentlemen on the other side will vanish out of sight.

Speaking at this late hour when the debate is closing, and following so many distinguished gentlemen who have already spoken, it would be ill-judged and improper for me to enumerate the thousand weighty and controlling reasons that suggest themselves to my mind why this bill should not only receive the sanction of Congress but the indorsement and approval of the people in every section of our country. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] and which by a majority vote of the House has just been incorporated in the bill, divests it of the only evil feature I have been able to see in it, and removes the only objection that would have influenced my action. That amendment, as I view it, brings the subject within the spirit and letter of the resolutions adopted by the Legislature of my State in reference to a centennial appropriation, and in that I find an ample warrant for my action if it needed more than a conviction of duty to influence my official conduct.

But, after all, the eloquent statesman from Mississippi has given with glowing and impressive oratory the reason that abides in the hearts of the people of this country, why this whole nation should come together moved by a common impulse and a common belief that the hearts of the people are longing for peace and reconciliation. However the mere politician may struggle for the mastery and battle for party supremacy, the people of the two sections, though so lately arrayed in hostile antagonism, are no longer enemies. The statesmen of the country and the soldiers who fought its battles on the one side or the other do not look with favor upon those who would build up political organizations by appeals to the passions and hatreds of the people and define party limits by sectional lines.

The gifted orator of Massachusetts during this and the debate that preceded it has thrilled this House and the whole country by an eloquent portrayal of a scene that transpired only a little while ago in the streets of the metropolitan city of his State, and which to every southern man will remain in all time to come one of the brightest imprinted upon the page of our country's history. The soldiers of Virginia who followed the banner of Lee and Johnston through the darkness and gloom of four years of disastrous war marching through Boston to Bunker Hill escorted by the veterans who had followed Sherman to the sea and Grant from the Wilderness to Appomattox, was an exhibition that would not have been possible under like conditions among any other people in the world.

In the southern city of my own home, away off upon the banks of the great inland sea, in the region torn and desolated by the war, I have seen those who wore the blue and those who wore the gray marching in a single column to the graves of their fallen comrades, bearing wreaths of beautiful flowers to decorate the last resting-place of the honored dead. We must no longer brood over the misfortunes of the past. The grandest destiny ever allotted to any nation that has been known to the history of the world awaits us in the future. The noblest ends and purpose any people ever accomplished since the dawn of civilization invite us to forget that we have ever been other than friends, and to move onward in the pathway of greatness with renewed faith and confidence in our system of government.

We have now reached a grand and memorable era in the life of our great Republic, in the history of enlightened government and free institutions—one that patriots and lovers of freedom in every land, for the past century of the world's history, have looked forward to with fond anticipations and anxious hope, and to which future generations of our own countrymen and kindred spirits in other lands will look back with pride and exultation as it recedes in the past, as long as love of liberty and the inspiration of patriotism shall stir the human heart.

The one hundredth year of our national existence is here, and, passing onward with the ever-moving tide of time, will soon bring the centennial dawn of the day upon which our great Republic was born, and, baptized in the fire of battle and the blood of patriots, took its place in the great family of nations.

A year of jubilee has come to the nation, and its advent is hailed by the American people with a joy and gladness akin to that which four thousand years ago filled the hearts of the children of Israel dwelling upon the banks of the Jordan and in the mountains of Judea, when coming to them in its appointed time the light of its opening dawn fell upon the golden spires of Jerusalem and spread over the beautiful plains of Palestine.

The sage, the Christian, and patriot have watched and prayed for its coming with the same earnest devotion and anxious yet steadfast faith with which God's chosen people, through all their weary wanderings, have waited and looked for the coming of that day, foretold by their prophets, when the scattered tribes of their nation shall be gathered together; when their rulers, clothed in royal purple and dwelling in the palaces of kings, shall again set upon the throne of David and hold their court in the temple of Solomon.

When the bright central day of our year of jubilee shall dawn—when its brilliant sun, like the star of our destiny, rising from the billows of the Atlantic, pouring its golden light upon the mountains and valleys of half a continent and spreading its gorgeous sheen upon the placid bosom of the broad ocean which bounds our western borders—millions of happy freemen will chant a grand anthem of praise and thanksgiving, the swelling volume of which will fill the world with a melody sweeter than the harp of David or the songs of Israel's daughters.

When our infant republic emerged from the smoke of battle and the clouds of war, with its great enemy overthrown, but with its bleeding wounds still unhealed, the lovers of liberty and free institutions looked upon its opening glory with rapturous admiration and love, but the minions of tyranny and despotism scowled upon it with distrust and angry hostility.

The retainers of monarchs and the advocates of kingly government were startled by the strange and novel doctrines it taught, and, unable to foresee and comprehend the grand destiny God had ordained it, they deplored its existence, doubted its success, and predicted its death.

But the young and adventurous intruder in the community of nations grew in strength and vigor, and, pressing along the pathway of national progress with a bold and fearless step, soon outstripped every competitor and left every rival far in the background, obscured by the shadow of its increasing greatness.

One hundred years have nearly passed away, and but few, ah, very few, of the three millions of people who heard the shouts of joy, the ringing of bells, and roar of cannon that announced the advent of the new-born nation are here; but forty millions of their posterity, spread over a vast empire in geographical extent, remain behind them to enjoy the blessings their patriotism and valor achieved.

Though torn by strife and convulsed by war, the nation they created, the government they constructed, still lives with renewed and matured strength, the greatest, grandest, and most beneficent known among civilized men, if wisely and justly administered.

The temple of freedom erected by our fathers, though its beauty has been marred and its fair surface defaced by the missiles of war, still stands firm as the mountain sitting upon its base of eternal rocks, and though it has been scathed by the lightning and shook by the storm, its spires, rising above the wind and the clouds, still gleam in the sunlight of heaven.

Though the altars reared by our ancestors have been leveled to the earth by the rude shock of war, they are now being rebuilt by loyal worshipers; fraternal hands are gathering together the scattered stones, laying them upon the sacred pile, and cementing them in their places with brotherly love and affection.

The shrine at which our fathers worshiped is yet unbroken, and, as the representatives of their posterity, as the ministering servants in the house where they fixed it, we this day gather around it as devotees to the genius in whose honor it was erected.

Though the tree of American liberty, planted one hundred years ago, has been drenched by the flood and bent by the tempest, yet it again stands erect, clothed in beautiful foliage, bearing golden fruit, and with its spreading branches shading the land from the rising to the setting sun. On the day it shall reach its centennial age, the whole American family are invited to gather around its trunk, and in its grateful shade spread a nation's banquet, at which the world shall be our guests.

Here every child of America may sit down at the paternal board and share the generous feast, and no Banquo's ghost shall stalk in their midst, clothed in gory garments and pointing to hideous wounds, reminding them of the dark and bloody deeds of a wicked civil strife.

There the returning prodigal who has wandered from his father's house may be welcomed back with a kiss of affection, fed at the family table, clothed in garments of many colors, and no grudging son will grow angry at a brother's coming nor murmur at a father's bounty.

As the stewards of the great American household we are called upon to furnish the means to prepare for the coming guests, to spread the board, and provide the feast for this centennial family re-union.

Let no stinted parsimony withhold the needed aid and mar the joy of an occasion fraught with so much of patriotic interest to us and wondering expectation to the civilized world.

One million and a half of dollars would be cheaply spent, wisely invested, if it would complete the work of repairing an injury to our political and social structure that was inflicted at an expense of treasures almost too vast to compute and a flow of blood and loss of life that shocks the reason and sicken the hearts of mankind.

Let us, who are of the returning prodigals to the house of our fathers, join in fraternal affection with our brothers who remained under the family roof while we wandered abroad in building a temple of love whose towering walls shall overshadow the monuments of hatred erected in an hour of folly and passion by hands that should never have relaxed their friendly grasp.

Let us show by our action upon this measure to the gallant men of the North, by whose prowess we were overcome in battle, that those who followed the fortunes of the South in its mighty struggle for a separate political existence have made no hollow truce, have plighted no Punic faith.

Let it no longer be said that we came back to the council of the nation with the same defiant hostility to the Government with which we met its armies in the hot whirlwind of war and under the lurid canopy of battle.

Let it no longer be said that we of the South are less devoted to the honor and good name of our common country; that we are less patriotic in our aspirations because we stood by our people in the hour of their calamity.

We know that the soldier of the North who followed his flag through the storm of war and flame of battle until its starry folds waved in triumph over Appomattox and the soldier of the South who upheld the banner of his section until it was forever folded in the gloom of the lost cause, gladly laid down their arms and rejoiced that the long and bloody strife of brothers was ended forever.

The struggle between soldiers is over, and only those who evoked the storm and fled its fury now flaunt the red banner of war, when the thunder of battle is hushed and only the gentle voice of peace is heard throughout the land.

The roar of the lion is no longer heard; his appetite for blood is appeased and only the cry of the jackal and the scream of the vulture break upon the stillness and quiet of universal peace.

Massachusetts has spoken through her representatives, and the voices of her BANKS and TARBOX, in eloquent appeals to reason and patriotism, have rung out above the din of party conflict, clear and loud as the bugle-note of the herald of peace, proclaiming good news and glad tidings throughout the land.

Let the younger members of the sisterhood of American States, those whose shields reflect the rays of a southern sun, clasp the proffered hands of their venerable elder sisters, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, whose eloquent messengers have invited the whole nation to a carnival of peace, fraternity, and good-will.

The great heart of the Republic yearns for a re-union of its children. The united voices of the American people cry out for oblivion of the past and united efforts for the glory of the future.

Peace, unveiling her fair face to the chosen children of her affection, commands them to cease their angry bickerings, hush their discontented murmurings, and again come with thankful hearts around the altar of a common country.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances I would not detain the House by any remarks of mine on this subject, because my views thereon are fully known; but born within a stone's throw of Independence Hall and representing the district wherein that sacred building is situated, I feel that it would be unseemly if I failed to raise my voice in behalf of this appropriation.

I have myself no difficulty in finding the power to vote this money. I believe it to be an attribute of sovereignty inherent in and springing out of our existence as a Republic; and believing it to be also in the line of strengthening friendship among the nations of the earth, advancing civilization, and promoting the arts of peace, I have no hesitation in giving it my cordial support.

Again, in voting for and advocating this measure, Mr. Speaker, I find that I am only following the example of many men in this country who have been known as the strictest constructionists of their time. I may be permitted briefly to indicate to the House some of the examples upon which I can safely rest as a warrant for my vote. I find Congress made an appropriation for the expedition to Japan. I find Congress appropriated money for the expedition to the South Sea Islands in 1836 under Commodore Wilkes. An appropriation was also made for the expedition to the North Pole, as well as for the expedition to the Dead Sea under Commodore Lynch. I find an appropriation was made for Herndon and Gibbon's exploration to the Amazon. Appropriation was made in 1847 to send relief to the suffering people in Ireland. That bill, sir, was taken up in the Senate on motion of Mr. Crittenden. It received the support and approval of Mr. Webster, while Mr. Calhoun declared that he saw no constitutional difficulty whatever in the way of its passage. Furthermore, in that discussion he suggested that relief should be given to the sufferers in France. In 1856 Sir John Franklin's vessel, the bark Resolute, found abandoned in the Arctic Sea, was brought to New London, Connecticut. This case has been alluded to heretofore in this discussion, and I therefore need not repeat what was then said. I find on that occasion Senator James M. Mason, from Virginia, voted to pay salvage, refit, and send to Great Britain that vessel, and he did it, he said, as an act of national courtesy and to promote good feeling. Mr. Mason himself reported the resolution, and it passed unanimously.

Money was appropriated to the sufferers by earthquake in Venezuela. Countless medals have been struck to commemorate great events and to honor deserving individuals. Numerous statues have been ordered, paintings purchased, and monuments erected in honor of foreigners as well as native citizens. Numerous appropriations have been made to relieve sufferers by famine and flood in various parts of this country, and most recently in behalf of the southern people.

Appropriations have been made by Congress to various municipalities to aid in the erection of monuments in memory of the revolutionary and other wars. Appropriations were made for the expedition to observe the transit of Venus. Appropriation to the world's fair or crystal-palace exhibition at London in 1851, to the French exposition at Paris in 1867, and for representation at the exhibition at Vienna in 1873—in all, for all three, not less than $700,000 was appropriated and spent by this Government, to the great benefit of our trade, manufactures, and commerce.

Now, an invitation has been extended to and accepted by all the nations of the earth to this centennial exposition at the city of Philadelphia. Shall it now be said that we have not the power to celebrate the one hundredth birthday of this Republic? Shall it be said here that we cannot contribute money out of the Treasury of the United States to strengthen and make a success of the exposition? That this nation has denied to itself the power to make an appropriation to celebrate the birthday, the centennial anniversary of the birthday of the American nation? Never, Mr. Speaker, never will I accede to such a proposition; but with my whole heart I cast my vote with complete unanimity of my people behind me unparalleled in the history of this country.

Mr. HOPKINS resumed the floor.

Mr. EAMES. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for one minute that I may make a request of the House. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to print some remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, expressing my views on this question. I have not as yet found an opportunity to express them in the House.

There was no objection, and leave to print was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. KETCHUM and Mr. CASWELL also, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to print remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I had intended to have addressed some remarks to the House, but considering the impatience of members to reach a vote I shall not carry out that intention, but will ask permission to print what I should have said.

There was no objection, and leave to print was granted.

Mr. EDEN. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not yield for that.

The main question was then ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by striking out all after the word "shall," in the sixteenth line down to and including the word "stock" in the nineteenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "To be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock."

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for a vote on that amendment.

The question being put on the amendment, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is next on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That the money by this act appropriated shall be paid to the treasurer of the centennial board of finance only after he and the president of the board shall execute a bond in the sum of $500,000 to the United States, with sufficient security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the safe-keeping and faithful disbursement of the sum hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. ATKINS and Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 130, not voting 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Bradley, William R. Brown, Burleigh, Cason, Caswell, Chapin, Chittenden, Clymer, Crapo, Crounse, Cutler, Danford, Darrall, Davy, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Egbert, Ellis, Farwell, Forney, Foster, Freeman, Frost, Frye, Garfield, Gause, Gibson, Hale, Hancock, Haralson, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Durand, Ely, Robert Hamilton, Hays, Lynch, Odell, Packer, Parsons, Payne, James B. Reilly, Starkweather, Charles C. B. Walker, White, and Jeremiah N. Williams—14.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll the following proceedings took place:

Mr. COX. I desire to state, on behalf of my colleagues, Mr. ELY and Mr. ODELL, that on this question they have paired off. If here, Mr. ELY would vote for and Mr. ODELL against the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I am paired with Mr. STARKWEATHER, of Connecticut. If he were here he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to say that I have received a telegraphic dispatch from my colleague, Mr. JAMES B. REILLY, who is detained by important legal business. If he were here he would vote "ay."

Mr. WHITE. I am paired with Mr. PACKER, of Pennsylvania. If he were here he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. BEEBE. My colleague, Mr. WALKER, of New York, is absent. If he were here he would vote against the bill.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to lay before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d of January instant, I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, January 25, 1876.

The SPEAKER. The report from the Secretary of State is so brief that the Chair will direct it to be read also.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 25, 1876.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d instant, that the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House of Representatives any correspondence which may have occurred during the past year between the Government of the United States and any European governments besides Spain in regard to the Island of Cuba, has the honor to report that no correspondence has taken place during the past year with any European government other than Spain in regard to the island of Cuba.

Instructions No. 266, dated November 5, addressed to Mr. Cushing, the minister of the United States at Madrid, and which were upon the 21st instant laid before the House of Representatives in answer to the resolution of that honorable body of the 17th instant, were orally communicated to several European governments by reading the same or by a statement of the purport thereof by the representatives of the United States to the ministers of foreign affairs of those governments, pursuant to instructions from this Department, which instructions accompany the report heretofore made, and were in like manner communicated to the House of Representatives on the 21st instant. No correspondence has, however, taken place upon the subject with these governments.

Respectfully submitted.

HAMILTON FISH.

The SPEAKER. The message, with the accompanying report, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. No. 1208) to amend the Revised Statutes touching vice-consuls-general; when the Speaker signed the same.

WAR DEPARTMENT CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 229 of the Revised Statutes, a statement of contracts made by the War Department for the year 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY RESERVATION AT CAMP DOUGLAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting correspondence relative to the military reservation at Camp Douglas, Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MONONGAHELA RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, the report of Major W. E. Merrill, Corps of Engineers, on the survey of the Monongahela River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF THE EASTERN BRANCH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, the report of S. F. Abert on the survey of the Eastern Branch from the navy-yard, Washington, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BIG SANDY CREEK, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 3, 1875, the report of Major J. M. Wilson, on the survey of Big Sandy Creek, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF LIEUTENANT-COLONEL PULFORD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a draught of the joint resolution sent to the Department of War by Lieutenant-Colonel John Pulford, (retired,) with his letter of transmittal; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ARSENAL GROUNDS AT BENICIA, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Chief of Ordnance on Senate bill 153, to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the arsenal grounds at Benicia, California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTY TO COLORED SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in accordance with section 228 of the Revised Statutes, a statement of expenditures, &c., in the collection and payment of bounty to colored soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS IN NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter for the Secretary of the Interior, inviting the attention of Congress to a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the 18th instant, recommending legislation for the relief of the Winnebago Indians of Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RACINE HARBOR, WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of Major D. C. Houston, Corps of Engineers, on the improvement of Racine Harbor, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. DARRALL to withdraw from the files of the House the memorial and papers in the case of Maria Waites, of New Orleans.

ELIZABETH B. STONE.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1563) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Stone; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS A. M. M'CLOUGHLIN.

Mr. MAISH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1567) for the relief of Thomas A. M. McCloughlin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON, (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BUCKNER: The petition of Mary C. Shaefer, for pay for infected clothing, &c., destroyed by order of the board of health of the District of Columbia during the prevalence of small-pox, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of D. C. Genau, for pay for property rented the District of Columbia, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 20th of January, a statement of his action under the act of Congress providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific railroad companies, approved June 22, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of B. D. Morton, late postmaster at Mecklenburgh, Virginia, praying the passage of a law authorizing the refunding to him of the amount of certain postage-stamps and stamped envelopes in his possession at the commencement of the late war and taken from him by the confederate authorities, and for which he afterward paid the Post-Office Department of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WALLACE presented a preamble and resolution of the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia, requesting Congress to appropriate money for the centennial exposition; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of Evan Hughs, late a private in Company B, Thirteenth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, praying the passage of a law granting him an honorable discharge from the military service of the United States and an allowance of back pay and bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WEST. I present the petition of several members of the State senate of Louisiana, with respect to the credentials of Mr. Eustis, Senator-elect. I present it on his behalf, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present a petition representing 12,000 lodges of Good Templars, they representing 850,000 members, the petition being signed by the officers of the grand lodge representing these bodies, asking for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic. As that question has been disposed of, I suppose that the petition may as well lie on the table, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have received and been requested to present a memorial of citizens of Castine and vicinity, in the State of Maine, who represent that the law granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to soldiers who served in the last war upon condition of personal settlement is unavailable to those who are crippled and disabled, and to many others. They therefore ask that a law be passed granting $200 pay in lieu of one hundred and sixty acres of land to such persons, a like sum to the widows and orphans of those who died in the service from wounds received or disease contracted, and a like sum to the dependent father and mother. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 193) for the relief of H. Clay Wood, major and adjutant-general, United States Army, have had the same under consideration and find that this claim was in the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs at the last Congress, and that that committee made an adverse report disallowing the claim. There has been no additional testimony presented to the Committee on Claims, and they therefore report it back and, under the rules of the Senate, recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and papers of Albrecht & Plagge, claiming the sum of $8,750 for injuries to fences and destruction of timber and crops by the United States Army, in the parish of Jefferson, Louisiana, in June, 1864, have had the same under consideration, and instruct me to report the same back with a written report, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the case. We find against the claim, recommending its disallowance. I move that this recommendation be concurred in by the Senate and that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry C. Watterson, praying to have refunded the amount paid for certain internal-revenue stamps used by him, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Salvador Costa, claiming $7,850 as the value of the sloop Mary Lawrence burned by United States officers and for the use thereof by the Government and losses sustained by him by being deprived of the said sloop, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John N. Curtis, praying the passage of an act authorizing and directing the southern claims commissioners to reopen and reconsider his claim, No. 5776, for property taken and appropriated by the Union Army, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, have directed me to report the same back with an amendment. I give notice that to-morrow, at the earliest moment when I can get the attention of the Senate, I will endeavor to call this resolution up, as the necessity for action on it is that whatever appropriation the Senate may deem fit to make should be made between this and the last day of this month, in order to meet the obligations of the Government falling due on the 1st day of February.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 93) for the relief of William G. Ford, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 227) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William Shepeard, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin, and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Louis Stern, praying compensation for services rendered the Government in preventing frauds on the revenues arising from the tax on distilled spirits, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William G. Ford, of Memphis, Tennessee, praying the proceeds of certain cotton alleged to have been seized by the agents of the Government in Mobile in 1865, have directed me to report that they decline to enter upon the merits of the petition on the ground that the loyalty of the petitioner is neither alleged nor proved. The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 238) to restore Julius S. Bohrer to the Navy of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Susan L. Harney and others, heirs of Augustus Fort, praying compensation for a survey and map or chart of Lake Ontario made by him in the early part of the present century, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel Duffy, a pilot of the Mississippi fleet during the late war, praying additional pay for his services, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1051) to provide for vessels of the United States hailing from places where they are owned or built, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George B. Loring and others touching the transportation of live stock, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill (S. No. 346) to correct an error in the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana ask for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir; if that should be the pleasure of the Senate.

No objection being made, the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It enacts that for the purpose of correcting an error in the act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873, so as to make the same truly express such laws, the following amendment is hereby made therein:

Section 2403 is amended by striking out in the second line the word "seven" and inserting the word "one," and all credits to settlers for moneys deposited by them for surveys of land, as provided by section 2401, allowed since the date of the approval of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are declared to be legal.

Mr. McDONALD. I will state that this bill was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and is, as it purports to be, a correction of an error in the Revised Statutes. The different sections have been erroneously referred to, and this simply makes the correction and confirms the act of the Bureau in executing the law as it was clearly the intention should be done.

Mr. WITHERS. It is a mere correction of an error, I understand?

Mr. McDONALD. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Indiana to correct the title of the bill so as to indicate its character.

Mr. McDONALD. That appears on the face of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. If the Chair will permit me, I ask the Senator to consider how by looking in the index of the statutes he will be able to find that statute from a mere entry in the index of a bill to correct an error in the Revised Statutes. If any gentleman looks at the Revised Statutes to ascertain the law on this subject, what indication will there be in the law of the land that the statutes have been changed in this particular? The Senator from Indiana knows the subject-matter of the bill so much better than I that I do not suggest the proper change in the title; I only express a desire that he will indicate the character of his bill in the title rather more definitely than merely by saying it is to correct an error in the Revised Statutes. As I had occasion to say a day or two since, bills are brought before us frequently merely stating that they are to change a certain section of the Revised Statutes, and their titles do not indicate the subject-matter at all.

Mr. McDONALD. The bill was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and it stands in the shape in which it was drawn. The section to be corrected is referred to in the body of the bill, and I apprehend if the title is corrected so as to refer to that same section it will remove all objection. The section is No. 2403.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As this matter pertains to the title, the Chair will put the question on ordering the bill to be read the third time, keeping the title open to amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand this bill comes from a committee, but nevertheless we have a Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and that committee has before it many such suggestions from the different Departments, and upon different subjects. I apprehend if the practice be introduced of amending the Revised Statutes with reference to alleged or actual errors through the various committees of the Senate in the end we shall be involved in greater difficulties in regard to the amendments made to the Revised Statutes than we are now in regard to the alleged errors in the existing edition of the Revised Statutes. I presume this is right, but I should like to have the bill go to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws in order that in that committee there may be a complete record of what is done by the Senate in regard to amendments to the Revised Statutes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And the changes ought to be embodied in one bill.

Mr. McDONALD. I see no objection to the bill taking that course.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not doubt the propriety of the amendment proposed by this bill, but I wish a perfect record kept of the proceedings of the Senate in this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill by unanimous consent will be committed to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. The Chair hears no objection.

NATURALIZATION LAW.

Mr. HOWE. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 626) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to naturalization, to report it without amendment; and inasmuch as the amendment will relieve from great inconvenience at once a large class of people, I ask that the Senate will consider it at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, required by section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may be made by an alien before the clerk of any of the courts named in that section; and makes valid all such declarations heretofore made before any such clerk as if made before one of the courts named in that section.

Mr. WHYTE. I would like to ask the Senator who reports this bill whether it makes any change except in allowing the clerk to take the affidavit instead of the court?

Mr. HOWE. None whatever; it just restores the old law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN TRUST FUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection at this time, the Chair will lay before the Senate the following bill, received yesterday from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. No. 1561) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasurer of the United States was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that bill be put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that all stocks, bonds, and other securities or evidences of indebtedness now held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the benefit of certain Indian tribes shall within thirty days be turned over to the Treasurer of the United States, to be held and disposed of in the same manner and upon the same trust as they have been heretofore held by the Secretary of the Interior; but this transfer is not to operate to affect the guardianship and control now exercised by the Secretary of the Interior over any Indian or Indian tribes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is due to the subject that the Senator from Iowa should explain this bill, so that a statement of the case may be placed upon the record.

Mr. ALLISON. This bill provides simply for the transfer of Indian trust funds from the Interior Department to the Treasury. It meets the approval of both the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, the Treasury Department being considered the best place for the custody of these securities. It has passed the House, and receives the unanimous approval of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate. If the Senator desires any further explanation, I can give it.

Mr. INGALLS. In addition to what the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, has said, I would add that it is a question of the safe-keeping of the Indian trust funds, the Secretary of the Interior not having the necessary safes for the custody of this property.

Mr. BOGY. This bill may perhaps have never heretofore been before Congress, but it is a subject that has been discussed by the Departments themselves. When I had the honor of being Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the matter was brought to my attention, and I made a report upon it. It is a question of really great importance that the funds should be transferred from the Interior Department to the Treasury. The Treasury is the only place where the necessary checks are provided, and I have no doubt (it has been the case before I know) that the Secretary of the Interior himself desires the change. The Treasury is the proper place for these funds, not as a matter of safety merely, but because no money can be drawn from the Treasury belonging to the Indians without the proper vouchers and requisitions, and that Department affords the only protection which the Indians have. It is very plainly right, and the bill ought to pass. A similar bill was referred, some time ago, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and has been considered by that committee, and, I think, will be reported favorably when we formally act upon it. It is a proper bill and should pass.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that the Committee on Indian Affairs has already reported favorably on that bill, and it is now upon the Calendar.

Mr. BOGY. I was not aware of it. The bill ought to pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSUL G. HARRIS HEAP.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis, to report it back. A day or two ago, the same committee reported a Senate joint resolution for this same purpose. As there will be no opposition to it, I presume, I ask that it be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move to insert at the end of the resolution the following words, which were in the Senate bill:

Provided, That during his absence from his post he shall receive no compensation from the United States.

Mr. BOGY. I have no objection to the amendment; but that is the law now. The amendment, therefore, is unnecessary. I was informed by the Secretary of State that that is the law now; but I have no objection to the amendment at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the joint resolution read the third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of James Roberts, Noah Roberts, and the heirs of John Roberts, heirs at law of Martin Roberts, deceased; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 348) for the relief of the widows and heirs of Roderick Shelton and others; which was read twice by its title, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 349) for the relief of Evan Hughs; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 350) granting a pension to James Ballard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, with the papers in the case already on file.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 351) for the relief of Isaac Davenport and others, citizens of Virginia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that the Committee on Claims have reported adversely upon that claim, but simply on the ground of the form in which the papers came before them, specifying that that report was not designed in any way to conflict with the interest of the petitioner. I move that the papers already on file be referred with the bill to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do I understand the Senator from Virginia to say that there is additional testimony presented in the case now?

Mr. WITHERS. There is testimony filed in the case now.

Mr. WRIGHT. Additional testimony?

Mr. WITHERS. Additional testimony; and the case is presented in a different form from that in which it was formerly presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It comes within the rule, and the motion is in order.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WHYTE, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of the State of Maryland against the United States be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. GORDON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Rebecca Frances Bailey, of Georgia, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. WEST, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Arthur Cornell be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CRAGIN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Thomas Bispham be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the cases of Butler, Miller & Co. and Hawkes, Miller & Co. be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CRAGIN. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Laban Heath be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

I will say that in this case the Committee on Claims have recently made an adverse report, but the claimant was absent and had no opportunity to be heard, and I am informed that the chairman of the committee, and also the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAPERTON,] who made the report, are perfectly willing that the papers should be recommitted.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that he move that the action of the Senate adopting the report be reconsidered and that the papers be recommitted. That would be the more regular way.

Mr. CRAGIN. Then I make that motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. Upon that question I wish to say a word. After conference with the Senator from West Virginia, who made the report in this case, I understand that no objection will be interposed to reconsidering this action of the committee; but there have been several reports made by the committee upon claims that have been referred to them, and immediately or soon after the reports have been made the parties interested have come to us and suggested that the testimony was not all in, and for this reason they wanted the papers recommitted and reconsidered. As a rule, where there are fair equities presented I shall interpose no objection; but I wish to suggest to Senators that the Committee on Claims are considering these matters as rapidly as they can, and have a great number of cases before them, and if from day to day we are to make reports, and have them reconsidered and recommitted, there is no end to our labors. I wish merely to suggest that we are considering those cases; we propose to consider them as rapidly as possible, and report them back; and if Senators, and especially claimants, wish that their cases shall be heard upon full testimony, we suggest and advise them that they had better prepare their testimony in the first place than come here to ask a recommitment of their claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reconsideration and recommittal? The Chair hears none. The papers will be recommitted by common consent.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. WEST submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to submit to the Senate copies of any propositions made by the Pacific railroad companies for the creation of a sinking fund for the redemption of the Government mortgages, together with a statement of the action of the Government thereon and of the reasons therefor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American independence;

A bill (H. R. No. 1564) to increase pensions in certain cases; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1340) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions and bounty land.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1208) to amend the Revised Statutes touching vice-consuls general; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

LAND ENTRIES WITHIN RAILROAD GRANTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, the morning hour has expired and the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 34) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. CHRISTIANCY to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. It is because I have paid some attention to this subject and because I am in favor of a bill covering the object aimed at by this bill that I object to the phraseology and to the construction of this bill, believing that it does not attain the object desired. Section 2 provides—

That when at the time of such withdrawal as aforesaid valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned, and, under the decisions and rulings of the Land Department, were re-entered by pre-emption or homestead claimants who have complied with the laws governing pre-emption or homestead entries, or shall make the proper proofs required under such laws, such entries shall be deemed valid, and patents shall issue therefor to the persons entitled thereto.

I am in favor of a law which will attain this end; that is to say, where a person having a valid pre-emption upon what we call railroad land desires for some reason personal to himself to give up that pre-emption, I think that thereby the right of pre-emption ought not to end; but if it is terminated, immediately upon its termination the right of the railroad under the law granting the land to the railroad takes its place and no ruling of the Land Bureau can prevent the operation of that law. It is true that we may pass a law here which will enable these persons to get patents, but it would only be a trap for the unwary, because in time the railroad would contest these rights and would in my estimation be sure to succeed in that contest. But I believe that where a pre-emption existed anterior to the railroad right, there was a legal vested right in that pre-emptor, which right can be by him transmitted to another party if the law can be made to authorize him to do it, and I believe such a law can be framed. As the law now is, the pre-emptor has a right to hold that land only if he remains on the land himself and complies with the conditions of the pre-emption law or of the homestead law. But I think that it would be competent for us to prevent the railroad from taking advantage of what is in this bill called an abandonment. Hence I look upon the second section as not at all calculated to attain this most desirable end. There are many such persons in the western country, and there are thousands of them on that line of proposed railroad, so long, going from the State of Minnesota to the Pacific Ocean. The whole line has been located, the lands have been withdrawn; and yet long prior to the withdrawal of those lands, parties, especially on the western extremity of that country, made pre-emptions. Many of those people want to change their location. We know it is the law of these western pioneers to go from one new country to another. It appears to be the mission which has been assigned to them to carry, as it were, the civilization of the eastern portion of the country from one new locality to another new locality in the western world, and they desire to abandon their pre-emption. I would frame a law by which the right to this pre-emption thus vested by law can be so transferred to another party, and that is all that is necessary, and by doing so you would secure the object aimed to be secured by this bill, and which I think is not attained by it as it stands now.

It will be observed that the first section of this bill would be narrowed as the bill stands now by the second section. The rights under the first section of the bill of a person who has located prior to lands being withdrawn are made perfect and complete, and by the second section they are rather impaired. I would not do that. I am not disposed to argue this matter at great length. I wish to present these points, so that they may go to the committee.

Now, as to the third section of the bill I do not exactly, in point of fact, understand the object aimed to be accomplished by it. It says:

That all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant, or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant, shall be deemed valid, and a compliance with the laws and the making of the proof required shall entitle the holder of such claim to a patent therefor.

To construe this thing technically, the section would be inoperative. It is possible that the Land Department would attempt to enforce it, but I think the attempt would not be to the interest of the pre-emptor or the homesteader, because although it may be true that the Land Department, by permission, will let a person locate on lands belonging to a railroad, and may make rules and regulations in relation thereto, nevertheless, if the land does belong to a railroad, these rules and regulations will not protect the locator; and yet I think he can be protected. But according to the decision read by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] yesterday, taken from 21 Wallace, the title to these lands is absolutely vested in the railroad company. My friend from Ohio shakes his head. If I am wrong I am anxious to be corrected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my friend from Missouri that I have read the decision, and when he uses the words "absolute title" it is too strong a phrase.

Mr. BOGY. I did not say "absolute title;" I said "absolutely vested."

Mr. SHERMAN. The right of possession is undoubtedly in the company.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a grant in præsenti. So the court decides.

Mr. SHERMAN. The decision does not go so far as gentlemen suppose, I think.

Mr. BOGY. The title is vested in præsenti in the railroad company. There is no question about that according to the decision of the Supreme Court, and I think the decision is undoubtedly correct. And that title can only be divested when the railroad company has failed to comply with the terms and conditions imposed upon it at the time of the grant. By whom? Not by an outsider, not by a person who may have gone there in good faith and made a location, and may have perfected his location so as to obtain a patent, and he is only putting off the evil day. The title can be divested from that railroad according to the decision of the Supreme Court, which is nothing but a re-affirmance of the well-known law on this subject as it exists in England and in this country, by act of the grantor, and the grantor here is the Congress of the United States; and until the grantor shall by act declare the title divested for non-compliance with the conditions which gave it existence, the title remains.

Though the third section declares that when a location shall have been made within the limits of any land grant at a time subsequent to the expiration of such grant, or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by grant, it shall be deemed valid, I do not think, for the reasons I have stated, this section will make the location valid, and I am anxious that the location should be made valid. Therefore on a review of this bill, as a sincere friend of the measure, I think it had better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or any other committee that the friends of the measure may desire. I myself am not much in favor of the Committee on the Judiciary, however able they may be as lawyers. I think I would rather refer the bill to another committee who would examine the matter a little more con amore.

I have said enough, Mr. President, to indicate my views.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this bill, although brief in words and very simple in its title, is very comprehensive in its scope, and far more important than many Senators would suppose from the manner in which it is presented and the title and language of the bill. This is really a conflict between railroad grants and the grants made to pre-emptors and homestead settlers; and when I say that it is this controversy which has given shade to the public opinion now pervading all the western land States of hostility to all grants of land to railroads, I only assert what is a truism and what is known to every Senator here. Probably the eastern Senators have already heard enough of the intense opposition in certain sections to land grants to railroads to appreciate that this affects not only a few people, but, I may say, millions of people in the Western States. In my intercourse with the western people—because Ohio has now got to be almost an Eastern State, having had for many years no public lands of any account—I have heard complaints of hardship growing out of the difficulties between the claims of the land-grant railroads and the rights of pre-emptors and settlers and the rights of purchasers of the public lands—hardships that, if I were to state them here, it seems to me would excite at least the sympathy of Senators, if not their judgment, in favor of the settlers.

The most marked case of hardship that I know of was a case that occurred in Iowa, where, in a very beautiful portion of our country, a great number of settlers were dispossessed of their lands to which they supposed they had a clear right, and dispossessed upon a shadowy construction as baseless as a dream. Perhaps I would not speak too strongly if I said, in regard to the land which was finally gotten by some of the corporations incorporated in the State of Iowa, that they received the land upon a title as shadowy as a dream, and yet they divested the title of thousands of honest people who are yet struggling for relief before Congress.

Mr. President, knowing these facts, I have read this bill to see whether or not there was in it anything inconsistent with the law or with the vested rights of the railroad companies. I do not think there is. It seems to me that every provision of this bill can be defended, not only upon the ground of equity, but upon the ground of the only decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that has been quoted in this debate that I have heard. The first proposition is—

> That all pre-emption and homestead entries, or entries in compliance with any law of the United States, of the public lands made in good faith by actual settlers upon tracts of land of not more than one hundred and sixty acres each, within the limits of any land grant, prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated.

Then the provision below is that such entries shall be valid and that patents shall issue. It would seem to me that this proposition is so plainly equitable that it would require a very strong act of Congress to overrule it. By our laws we have invited the people of the United States and of all the countries of the world to go upon the public lands, occupy them, possess them, and have provided for their making their claim in a defined way before an officer of the United States, and when they do that, they may go and live upon these lands and develop them and build up the country. This section simply provides that where men have in strict compliance with the acts of Congress thus acquired a possessory right to lands by their labor, by their occupation, that right shall not be defeated by any constructive grant of Congress until notice is given of the location of the road over and on the lands that they are occupying. To defeat so plain a right as that, it seems to me, a railroad company ought to have a clear and decisive act of Congress in so many words.

Under these circumstances, thousands of men in possession of public lands under our laws developing the country, a railroad grant made by Congress of an uncertain nature, depending upon a future location, a conditional grant made of alternate sections, has divested the possessory rights of such men. All the land grants that have been made which I know about depend upon a future survey. They are not grants subject to forfeiture, but they are conditional grants with many conditions attached to them. These are, first, that the railroad company may possess and enjoy the alternate sections in a certain region of country, defining it, but not to take effect until the location is made. The provision as to location is not in the nature of a forfeiture, but it is a condition upon which the land is granted; it is just as much a condition as the word "alternate," which only gives the grantee the alternate and not all the sections of land within the prescribed limits. Therefore every grant of land to a railroad company is a grant of the alternate sections of land on a line to be surveyed by them, the map of which shall be filed with the General Land Office and notice given to the local land offices. Now this bill comes in and says that this right of the railroad company to secure a grant of land shall not take effect so as to defeat the bona fide honest grants already made under acts of Congress to actual settlers. It seems to me that this is just, or if there is any doubt about it I certainly will give to the locator the benefit of our law, and if he is forced to assert and defend his right I will give him at least the patent of the United States made in pursuance of the pre-emption and homestead laws, and I do not believe then his rights will be contested.

The next point is the one raised by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY;] but it seems to me that here the right of the settler is clear and unequivocal, so that there can be no doubt about it. The latter part of the first section provides:

> Or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office, and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with, and proper proofs thereof have been made by the parties holding such tracts or parcels, they shall be confirmed, and patents for the same shall issue to the parties entitled thereto.

All the railroad grants are in the nature of conditional grants. They are upon the condition that a certain railroad shall be built; they are made to promote the construction of a railroad, and that railroad by the terms of the law is always to be constructed within a certain time, say ten years, or whatever may be the time limited. All these grants to railroads are upon condition that the company shall build the road within a certain time. Whether that has been done is a fact easily ascertained. It seems that under the former construction at the Land Office—and a very proper one I think, though it has been overruled by more recent authority—it was the custom to regard the termination of the time within which the railroad was to be built as one of the conditions of the grant; and it was held under the law as it stood that when the time ran out within which the railroad was to be completed, if in fact it was not built—a public fact well known—the Commissioner of the General Land Office was then to restore the lands to market. This bill simply provides that after the Commissioner of the General Land Office, an officer of the Government, acting in pursuance of the very laws granting these lands, has held that the time has expired, and has restored to market the lands formerly withdrawn, and openly proclaimed that they should be sold or be open to entry under the homestead and pre-emption laws, if then our people go and settle upon them, their title, thus, I may say, invested or acquired in land again opened for entry by the officer having charge of it, shall not be defeated by any subsequent act of Congress extending the original grant or extending the time for the completion of the road.

That is the whole effect of it, if I understand the first section of the bill, and if I understand the argument of the Senator who reported it. There are two propositions: first, that where a man acquires a fair and honest title, (because it can apply to no other,) by grant, or purchase, or pre-emption, upon the public lands through the local land office, his right to a patent shall not be defeated until the company that claims under a conditional grant shall have filed in the local land office notice that the land in a particular region of country falls under the grant. That seems to me to be perfectly right. The other proposition is that if the railroad company has neglected to build the road, and the time has expired within which it was authorized to build it, and upon which condition-precedent the whole grant depends, and after that the Commissioner of the General Land Office having determined the fact that the condition had not been complied with and restored the lands to the public market, then, if the settler goes upon a part of that land and acquires a title by possession, he shall have the benefit of a patent to maintain his possession against the railroad company, even though Congress may, without the proper exception, have extended the time for the building of the road. That is the whole of the first section, as I understand; I know that is all that is claimed for it, and I believe it is admitted to be so.

The next proposition is still more clear to my mind, and it seems that no man can resist the force of equity and law in behalf of the second section. It provides—

That when at the time of such withdrawal as aforesaid valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned, and, under the decisions and rulings of the Land Department, were re-entered by pre-emption or homestead claimants who have complied with the laws governing pre-emption or homestead entries, or shall make the proper proofs required under such laws, such entries shall be deemed valid, and patents shall issue therefor to the person entitled thereto.

Let us see what this is. Take the case of a region of country over which a land grant extends; a portion of that land is necessarily covered by pre-emption and homestead claimants, because all our public land is so covered to a greater or less extent. Congress grants to a railroad company a conditional title to a piece of land, alternate sections over a certain region of country. At the very moment that grant is made in Congress certain persons have possessory rights given by our law; they have what is called an imperfect or inchoate title, depending upon their residence upon the land and their improvement of the land. There they are in possession, with a title, so far as it goes, as valid as any grant Congress can give. It could not be more valid if a patent had issued at the time they entered into possession. As a matter of course, their rights are protected without any law whatever, and the grant to the railroad company cannot defeat their individual rights as claimants. But that is not all that Congress does in all these land-grant laws, every one of them that I have seen. Congress in all cases, when making the grant of alternate sections, expressly reserves the land upon which all these claims exist, and says expressly, in so many words, in the very grant to the railroad company, We grant you the alternate sections, except such land as there may be now, at the time of the passage of the act, any claim to under the pre-emption or homestead law that is valid. It excepts the land, not merely the rights of the particular claimant, but all the lands upon which there is a valid pre-emption or homestead claim, just as it does the even sections, and no right whatever is conferred by any railroad grant that I have seen to any land on which a settler lives who has a valid claim.

Mr. MITCHELL. Even though the settler may abandon it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Precisely. So it is expressly excepted. I am indebted to my friend from California [Mr. SARGENT] for giving me a reference to the section. This is the grant, and this is the only title the railroad companies have, for, so far as I have seen, they are all the same in this respect:

That there be, and is hereby, granted to the said company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores thereon, every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad, on the line thereof, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road—

not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed.

Here is a grant of a large mass of lands, but there are some exceptions. First, the even sections—those that are designated in the public surveys by even numbers—are excepted. Next, those that the United States has previously granted are excepted. Next, all those lands on which there is at the time of the grant a valid grant in favor of any person under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, and which might afterward be patented, are excepted. So that the railroad company under its grant has no color of a title to the land that is held then in legal occupancy under a valid claim by a settler under the homestead or pre-emption law no more than it has a valid title to the even sections reserved by the grant. It may be in the course of events that the settler may change his location; he may sell it out; he may go off and abandon it; but the land that he occupied is expressly excepted from the grant, and the mere fact that he is unable to go on and fulfill the conditions of the law so as to give him a title to a patent does not operate in favor of the railroad company, but operates in favor of the public at large, or in favor of any other settler who may settle on the land afterward, or may by purchase acquire a right.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would suggest to the Senator, with his permission, that the same statute also provides that the railroad company shall have other sections of land in place of those sections thus settled on by homesteaders or pre-emptors at the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I remember that in some of the later acts for railroad companies, where their grant was not large enough on account of this exception, Congress has allowed the selection of other lands to make good that deficiency, showing that Congress contemplated that they never could claim under any circumstances the title to the particular land to which a homestead or pre-emption claim at the time existed, because Congress has given them other land to make good the land thus occupied and claimed.

Now, Mr. President, to say that because a man having a legal and valid possessory right to a piece of land abandons that land, or sells it out to somebody else, or does not in all regards comply with the homestead law, or because somebody else gets his possessory right in an irregular and an illegal manner, therefore a railroad company which has never received a grant of it from anybody shall come in and defeat, for any reason whatever, perhaps a technical one, the right of the claimant to that land, is absurd. The result of that is to give the railroad companies a reversion to all this land.

Mr. BOGY. Allow me to ask a question. The Senator takes the ground that this land has never been passed by grant to the railroad company; it remains as other public land undisposed of. That is the Senator's position?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOGY. If that be so, why is any legislation necessary to secure the pre-emptor's right? If that position be correct, the land stands still as public domain of the United States, and anybody can go on that land and make a pre-emption or locate a homestead.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can answer that very easily. The trouble is that the railroad company being always present and the office not, perhaps, having notice of the abandonment of this claim or the nature of it, the land falling within the general description of the grant and the facts not being known here, refuses to give patents to the persons who claim them.

Mr. SARGENT. If my friend will allow me, I think I can explain the difficulty to the Senator from Missouri in a moment. The person who had the original pre-emption claim unquestionably could have proved up against the railroad company when the land was surveyed, and procured his patent; but the general pre-emption law does not recognize any sale from one party to another. The original pre-emptor holds on until a year or two after the grant is made, having during all that time, if there were a survey, an opportunity to procure his patent; but no survey comes, and finally he sells. He finds the locality unhealthy to him, or for any other reason he sells to some other person. That other person who comes in thinking, perhaps, that he can arrange with the original party, finds he is mistaken; he is cut off by this provision of the general pre-emption law; and the railroad company which, as the Senator from Ohio says is always present, comes in and asks for this land, and there is nobody that the Land Office recognizes who can contest it. They will not allow the second possessor to contest, because they say "you cannot date back far enough, you cannot allege any occupation of this land prior to the grant." Consequently there is a failure of parties against the railroad company, and thus the railroad comes in and takes it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I will read the third section of the bill, and that, it seems to me, is as clear as the others:

SEC. 3. That all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant, or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant, shall be deemed valid and a compliance with the laws, and the making of the proof required shall entitle the holder of such claim to a patent therefor.

This section was the only one which gave me any difficulty when I first read the bill, because it seemed to imply that the party himself might seek to take advantage of a forfeiture when the Government of the United States had declined to do it. Where land has actually been granted for a railroad, the Government alone can take advantage of the forfeiture, if any occurs. The Supreme Court, it seems, has decided that this is in the nature of a forfeiture, and that the Government alone has the power to take advantage of it. But this section is so framed that the right of the individual cannot accrue, cannot be based on this section until the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who has charge of this matter, has decided that the time has expired during which the grant ran. It was a grant only for a limited period and dependent upon a condition. The time has expired; the Commissioner of the General Land Office has restored the land to market under the general provisions of the law. Now here is the officer of the Government of the United States again offering this land for sale by public proclamation which must receive the approval of the President, because every proclamation or act of this kind restoring lands to public sale is the act of the executive authority. Every act restoring land to sale or offering it for sale is the act of the President of the United States. When the Land Department, acting under the executive authority of the United States, offers the land again for sale and invites the people of the United States to go and settle upon it, and that invitation is published all over the world, when the Land Department has declared that the railroad company's time is out, that the condition has not been complied with, and that the United States again has full authority, and when it asserts its authority, when it offers to sell the land to an individual and he acquires a homestead or pre-emption title under it, I would ask if the title thus acquired can be defeated by an extension of the time to build the railroad by a subsequent act of Congress, or anything of that kind? It is again offered for sale by executive authority under the law, and it is quite a different case from that referred to in 21 Wallace's Reports now before me. In that case, Judge Field, in his decision, expressly asserts and maintains the right of the Government of the United States at any time to take advantage of a failure of the conditions. He asserts that the Government of the United States may, upon a failure to comply with the conditions of the grant, assert its ownership over the land; that the land reverts to the United States, and that the United States may, by legislation or by judicial proceedings, or otherwise, assert its right again to the possession of the land. Otherwise it would require an act of Congress, whenever a railroad company had not complied with some condition, to sell its own lands, the lands of the United States. The President of the United States, it seems, in all the cases provided for by this third section, has asserted the right of the United States to occupancy and possession of the land and the right to sell it, has entered upon it under the public law, offered it for sale, invited homestead and pre-emption claimants. And then, the fact that Congress may, in perhaps ignorance of the rights of third parties, ignorance of the rights of pre-emption or homestead claimants, have extended the time for building the railroad, certainly ought not to defeat the claims and rights which have been acquired under the disposition of the land made under the authority of the President and the Land Department to individuals. That is all there is in the third section, because you will see that all these entries depend upon action by the Land Department after the conditions of the grant have not been complied with.

It seems to me, therefore, that this is, first, an assertion, simply, of the power of Congress to provide the mode and manner of disposing of the public lands when the railroads have failed to comply with the terms and conditions of their grants; and, second, a provision that the right of a private individual shall not be defeated in a particular district until the location of the land grant has been made known to the local land office, so that the person who comes to apply for a quarter section of land may know from the officer of the United States whether or not he has the right to enter it; and, third, a protection of the rights of those claimants who have acquired those rights under a disposition made by the United States under the authority of law. It seems to me that in all these cases it is perfectly clear and patent.

I would ordinarily vote to refer any bill to the Committee on the Judiciary where there was any question of very grave doubt involved; but it must be remembered that if we refer every legal question to the Judiciary Committee we should have to refer to it almost every bill that is presented in Congress. That was not the intention. I do not think this case presents a subject necessarily requiring the consideration of the Judiciary Committee. It is very properly a case for the Public Lands Committee, because the members of that committee must be more familiar with the laws relating to the public lands than the Committee on the Judiciary; certainly they are more familiar with them than I would be if I were called upon to act on it.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me I desire to say here—and I can say so very properly, not being a lawyer myself—that I think the Committee on Public Lands is composed largely of lawyers of distinction, having as ample knowledge at any rate of the laws that relate to questions of this kind as probably the members of any committee of the Senate. Besides, the bill under consideration has been before that committee twice and has received ample attention.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would but delay a simple act of justice to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and give to that committee additional labor, of which they have now enough. I do not think, unless there is some question more of a legal character than is presented by this bill as yet, it ought to be referred to that committee. This is simply a construction of the land laws of the United States, a matter with which the Committee on Public Lands must necessarily be more familiar. It all turns on the construction of statutes with which they must be familiar, and the machinery and organization of our public-land system. I shall therefore vote against the reference and vote for the bill on its manifest equity.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am strongly disposed to vote in favor of this bill, provided some doubts in relation to it shall be cleared up, for my sympathies are altogether in favor of the settlers rather than in favor of the railroad grantees. But what embarrassed me most is that bills come in here in the first place for grants to or charters of railroads, setting forth clearly the rights of the railroads to the odd sections of lands for a certain distance and exempting all pre-emption rights, and then we have claims coming here from the same localities in behalf of actual settlers, and in some instances we have been compelled to pass laws giving actual settlers twice the amount of land that they held by previous pre-emption, and then subsequently have been met by a further claim on the part of the railroads for lands to which they thought they had a vested title.

Now, I am not aware that the Senator from Ohio has charged the Land Office with any dereliction of duty in relation to this matter, while the laws, as he declares, are perfectly plain and explicit on the whole subject, so plain almost that the man who runs may read. I would like to know what the Commissioner of the General Land Office has to say for himself for such a wild decision of his Department as to involve us in this difficulty of claims between the railroads and the settlers if the laws heretofore passed have been so plain and explicit.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont will see that this bill does not authorize a patent to issue in any case except where the Land Department has offered the land for sale and decided in favor of the right of the pre-emptor. But there has been a recent change in the decision of the Land Office read by my friend from Kansas [Mr. HARVEY] yesterday. I think he will find the explanation in that change.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me at the same time that there must have been gross neglect of duty on the part of the Commissionor of the General Land Office, to have involved this case in any difficulty at all.

The only thing I desire about this bill is, that it shall be so carefully considered that we shall not hereafter have a claim presented by fifteen or twenty railroad companies to make up the loss that we are now inflicting upon them by the passage of this bill, and which the Senator from Ohio may excuse, as he excuses the past, on account of the ignorance of Congress in passing such a bill; and therefore, after the criticism of the Senator from Missouri, who perhaps understands this question as well as any Senator here, I should be most decidedly in favor of having this bill committed to the Judiciary Committee for further investigation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, I think if the settler upon the public lands of the United States could have had the privilege of going into a court of justice and having his rights adjudicated, the difficulty which the Senator from Vermont who has just taken his seat has complained of would never have arisen. The whole difficulty arises from the fact that the settlers upon the public lands have no standing in a court of justice in the absence of any title to the land. They have no title nor have they any color of title, and therefore they cannot go into a court of justice and seek for even a construction of the law under which they claim their rights. Prior to the late decision of the Secretary of the Interior which has been referred to these difficulties did not arise, because the settlers upon the public lands had notice when those lands were withdrawn, and they never attempted to assert any right in them. Therefore no controversy ever arose. But under an existing ruling, after they have settled upon the lands they are met with a decision by the Secretary of the Interior which reverses the ruling that previously existed and deprives them of the rights which they supposed they had when they entered upon the lands. They can have no opportunity of ever having that question tested, and that is the reason they are compelled to ask redress at the hands of the Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I suppose if any charter of a railroad company has vested an absolute, unconditional estate in fee in a railroad corporation in these lands this act will not divest that title. That would not be attempted, because it could not be effectual. If there is no title vested, then it is competent for the Congress of the United States to declare when the title shall vest in the settler, and by this first section they prescribe definitely, so as to remove from the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office any determination of that question. This bill fixes definitely the time when the rights of the people to settle on these public lands shall be determined; that is, when the lands are withdrawn from settlement by the Secretary of the Interior and when that notice is given to the people at the local land offices.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. This bill applies exclusively, as I understand the case, to the past and not to the future.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It covers both, I think.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It is admitted on all hands that the cases for which it is intended to provide are past cases.

Mr. INGALLS. As one of the advocates of the bill, I certainly cannot consent to be bound by the construction placed upon it by the Senator from Michigan. It is a bill general in its provisions, and may apply to cases in the future as well as in the past.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I so understand the bill; but if it were as the Senator from Michigan thinks, the remarks I have already made relieve the question of any difficulty. Then the settlers would have the right to go upon these lands at any time prior to their withdrawal and notice of the withdrawal at the local land offices, and have had that right heretofore under this bill; so that any settlement heretofore made under these circumstances is in effect declared to be valid by this bill; and I see no objection whatever to that principle.

That is the first section of the bill. With reference to the second section, I think it important to state what I regard to be the effect of this section in view of the fact that in construing this law hereafter persons may look to the debates in the Senate and to the views that Senators have taken. The second section provides—

That when at the time of such withdrawal as aforesaid valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands within the limits of any such grants which afterward were abandoned, and, under the decisions and rulings of the Land Department, were re-entered by pre-emption or homestead claimants who have complied with the laws governing pre-emption or homestead entries, or shall make the proper proofs required under such laws, such entries shall be deemed valid, and patents shall issue therefor to the person entitled thereto.

I think this section embraces all the cases to which Senators have referred. But I am inclined to think that it embraces some other cases or has a still further effect, and with that view I shall vote for it. The language of the section is "that when at the time of such withdrawal as aforesaid valid pre-emption or homestead claims existed upon any lands." The effect of this section is to declare, construed in connection with the first section, that where a settlement has been made upon the public lands at any time prior to the notice of withdrawal of the lands the pre-emption is a valid claim. It makes valid what may heretofore have been regarded by some as not being a valid pre-emption claim. If the settlement was made after the line was located, under the late ruling of the Secretary of the Interior it would not be a valid pre-emption claim; but under the first section of this bill such a settlement is declared to be a valid claim, and the second section also recognizes the claim as valid and would embrace that class of cases also, and it is in harmony with the whole bill that it should be so construed. Such I think to be its proper construction. I think the construction is a just one. I think the provision is a just one. That applies only in cases where the grants made to the railroad companies are afterward abandoned by the railroad corporations.

The third section of the bill is plain.

I see no reason for a reference of the bill to the Judiciary Committee. The Committee on Public Lands is composed of gentlemen many of them of eminent legal ability, and it is composed of men who are familiar with the facts as they exist in the region of our country to which this bill particularly applies. They know the practical operation of the land laws, and they are capable of giving a legal construction to any bill presented to them. I therefore think the bill should not be referred.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the case in 21 Wallace which was referred to yesterday, and which, I think, supports the view I took yesterday in regard to the law, certainly what ought to be the law. What was that case? In 1856 Congress made a grant to the State of Wisconsin for the purpose of making certain railroads. The language of the grant was in præsenti, "is hereby granted." The line was surveyed and the route was located some time before 1864. The map was filed afterward, I think in 1869 or 1870. After the State had completed the title by performing all the conditions required to designate the land, parties cut logs upon the land, and an agent of the State of Wisconsin seized upon the logs. In that case the court held that by the grant the State of Wisconsin acquired a right in præsenti to that much land; and that, when the land was designated and the map filed, the title attached to that particular land and was completed at that time.

The court, in that decision, refers to an old case in 2 Wheaton, decided by Chief Justice Marshall, which carries out the idea precisely. The State of North Carolina had donated for the relief of the soldiers of the continental line a certain specified tract of land, designating the tract; but it was not divided among these soldiers. Afterward the State passed a law donating to General Nathaniel Greene twenty-five thousand acres, to be afterward surveyed and allotted by commissioners in this tract of land. After that time, and before the allotment was made, the State of North Carolina opened this land to public sale in the land office, and certain parties made purchases of this land. In that case the court said that by the designation of the particular tract of land in the original grant it was set apart and the grantees acquired an imperfect interest, although it was not divided among them. The tract granted to the soldiers of the continental line was specified; but how it should be divided among them was not then known. Afterward General Greene got a grant of twenty-five thousand acres to be taken out of that tract. After that was done, the State of North Carolina opened these lands to public sale. The court decided that these lands were not subject to entry, because a present interest had passed to the soldiers in a body. Therefore the case is different from that of the lands contemplated in this bill, because here they are open to private entry.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Indiana that my object in quoting that decision yesterday was to show the necessity for the last section of this bill.

Mr. MORTON. I understand that; but the Senator from Missouri referred to it this morning as settling this question. In the case in 2 Wheaton, Chief Justice Marshall used this language, speaking of the grant to General Greene:

> As the act was to be performed in future, the words directing it are necessarily in the future tense: "Twenty-five thousand acres of land shall be allotted for and given to Major-General Nathaniel Greene." Given when? The answer is unavoidable: when they shall be allotted.

His title began from that time when the land shall be allotted by the commissioners, or, in the other case, when the railroad companies shall make their selection and file their map; but in that case the title of the settlers was held not to be good, because the land was not subject to private entry at the time, that whole body of land having been set apart and withdrawn from the market. That is not the case here. These lands are subject to private entry, and the question comes up now whether, in the case of a general grant to a railroad company, the lands not being located, a settler enters and occupies them while they are still subject to private entry, and afterward the company files a map, its title reverts back and takes the land from the private settler. I say no, upon principles of law; I say no, upon principles of equity; and in this very decision the court says that public grants shall be construed strictly against the grantee, and in favor of the general public.

Now, Mr. President, to come down to it simply as a matter of common sense, the actual settlers are generally men of small means; they are not able to travel far and to travel often. The settler seeking a home in the West goes to the land office; he inquires for lands open to private entry; the charts and maps are shown to him; he is pointed to land that he may enter upon; he does enter upon it; perhaps he has never heard of a railroad grant in that locality; it may not have been made at that time, or if it was made perhaps he has never heard of it, and if he has he does not know where the road is to go. It may go in this range of townships or in that range of townships; there is no location of it. Now, for the railroad company to come in one or two or three years afterward, and locate its line of road, and file a map, and take the land from that man, is a monstrous injustice, and the Government should not permit it for a moment. You cannot repair the damage by giving to him the little amount of money he has expended upon it or the value of the little improvements he has made. That is no compensation at all in such a case.

Mr. INGALLS. They do not give the improvements; they merely return the fees paid to the local office.

Mr. MORTON. That amounts to nothing at all.

Mr. SARGENT. And the settler loses the interest of his money.

Mr. MORTON. As the Senator from California says, he loses the interest of his money even.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I have no intention at this time to enter into the merits of this bill, but my only purpose is to say a word on the question now before the Senate, which is the proposition of the Senator from Michigan that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

This bill was before the Senate at the last Congress. It came here from the House of Representatives. It was considered by the Committee on Public Lands and reported favorably precisely as it now stands. It has been again considered by that committee and again reported favorably. Now, it is proposed, notwithstanding there is not anything in this bill that peculiarly demands the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary, that it shall be taken from the Senate after a discussion of almost one day and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I appeal to every friend of this bill, whether in favor of it in its present form or in favor of it with such amendments as he thinks may be made to it, to stand by the bill as it is, and avoid the committal of it to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think it is due to the Senate that they should keep it before the body. What reason is there that this bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary? If you look to the composition of the Committee on Public Lands, you will find, as has been suggested, some of the ablest lawyers in this body, and so it was composed in the last Congress when the committee also had a similar measure under consideration. To that committee are intrusted peculiarly all questions arising under our statutes touching our public lands. That committee have reported for years and years the bills that we have had touching our public lands. They are a continuing committee from session to session and from Congress to Congress, and members of the Senate are now upon that committee who have been there for years. They have had all these questions under consideration and examination, and are as well prepared and better prepared to investigate and determine and report upon them than the Committe on the Judiciary. There is not a single question in this case that belongs peculiarly to the Judiciary Committee; and I feel bound to say that the Committee on Public Lands is more competent to determine and report to this body than the Committee on the Judiciary.

I therefore trust, I repeat, that every friend of this bill, whether a friend of it in its present form or as he thinks it may be amended, will insist that the bill shall remain where it is, having come from the appropriate committee, and that committee having twice reported favorably upon it. Let us take action now; and if these settlers are to lose their homes, if they are to be turned away from their homesteads because of what I am bound to believe is a morbid sentiment in favor of what are called vested rights in favor of railroad companies, let us know it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this question is one that affects all the public lands of the country. It is one that brings before us all the land grants made by the United States. I have no morbid feeling in favor of vested rights. All my prejudices are with the settler; all my predilections are with him; and I am ready to help perfect a bill that will give him relief. I, however, agree with what has just been said, that there is no necessity of referring this bill to the Judiciary Committee. What I should like would be to see this bill made the special order for some day next week, so that we may have an opportunity of looking into it. The committee which has reported the bill is quite as competent to investigate it as the Judiciary Committee, but I think on so important a question the whole Senate should have an opportunity to investigate it.

It has occurred to me that this bill may have an effect on a very important suit which is pending, and I know that Congress would not want to interfere by legislation with a question which has been before the courts and is now there pending. In 1825 a treaty was made with the Osage Indians by which the United States reserved a large tract of land for those Indians as long as they should see fit to occupy it. In 1866 those Osage Indians conveyed those lands to the United States in trust, allowing the lands to be sold under the public laws in reference to the sale of lands, the proceeds to be invested in a fund for Indian civilization. Large quantities of land were sold by the United States under that treaty. That was in 1866; but it so happens that in 1863, three years prior to that sale of the Osage lands, the United States had conveyed to Kansas a large tract of land for the benefit of railroads there to be constructed. The United States some years ago filed a bill against those railroad companies to have the patents issued to Kansas canceled, because the Government held that the reservation in the treaty of 1825 excepted those lands from that grant made in 1863, and the circuit court of the United States decided that question in favor of the United States, thereby validating, thereby rendering good and perfect the title to all those settlers who had bought under the action taken in 1866. That decision has been appealed from, and within the last two months it has been argued in the Supreme Court of the United States and is there awaiting decision.

I do not know that this bill will affect that question; but it does seem to me that an act passed saying that all settlers who settled before the lands were withdrawn from the local land office shall have a valid title is declaring that all those who purchased under the action of 1866 have a good title, notwithstanding the grant by Congress for the benefit of these railroads in 1863. I do not know that it has that effect. I do not want this question referred to the Judiciary Committee. I am in favor of a measure for the relief of settlers. What I do ask is that a day shall be fixed next week, so that we may have an opportunity of looking into this question and thus be enabled to act with intelligence.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not my desire to prolong this debate, but I am entirely opposed to the motion for reference that has been made by the Senator from Michigan and that is now pending, and for more reasons than one. Inasmuch as the Senator from New Jersey has seen fit to refer to what are known as the Osage ceded land cases between the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad and the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad and the settlers upon what are known as the Osage ceded lands, I will say that if (which I do not by any means believe) the question involved in this bill is at issue in those cases pending elsewhere, no one knows better than the Senator from New Jersey that this bill ought not to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, because I believe that I commit no impropriety in saying that the chairman of that committee is one of the attorneys for the railroad companies in those cases. Therefore there is a very manifest impropriety in the reference suggested by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I stated that I was opposed to this bill going to the Judiciary Committee, not that I was in favor of it.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not understand that the Senator from New Jersey favored the reference, but there are some members of the Senate who do.

But, sir, the question between the settlers on the Osage ceded lands and the railroad corporations claiming those lands, as I understand it, is not based upon any consideration that is involved in this bill. The claims of the railroad companies to those lands and the claims of the settlers to those lands are based upon a question entirely different from that which arises upon the decision of the Secretary of the Interior as to the time when a claim of pre-emption or homestead settlement becomes valid or when a railroad title may attach. I beg to say that, without going further into the merits of those cases, simply to disabuse the minds of the Senate as to the status of this question.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I do most heartily desire to vote for some measure calculated to extend relief to the persons who are sought to be benefited by this bill; but I confess I do not see my way clear to vote for the pending bill. If I understand the case as it is presented, it is in substance this: Certain pre-emption claimants and perhaps another class of claimants or two had acquired certain rights anterior to the time when a grant issued to certain railroad corporations. If those rights were valid when first acquired and if they were not lost, then a subsequent grant to the railroad company could not divest them. If, however, they were lost for any cause, and a subsequent grant was made to the railroad company, then certain rights vested in the railroad company, and anything we can do cannot divest those rights. I understand that the purpose of this bill is to cure, if possible, the rights of pre-emptors and any other persons having like rights.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, I will correct a misapprehension he labors under. It is not to cure any rights of pre-emptors or homestead settlers, but to remove from their rights a cloud, an obstruction which has been placed in their way by an unwarranted ruling of the Interior Department, a ruling which the Secretary in the very letter making it admits to be a new one and one different from and contrary to the former ruling of the Department, changing by that ruling the effect and operation of the law as effectually as though the law itself had been changed; and yet no such change had been made by law, but it was simply a change of ruling by the Department, the result of which was that a settler, no matter how closely he might have complied with the law in all its requirements, yet had his homestead certificate or his certificate of pre-emption settlement canceled, and his patent refused, simply because the time had not arrived when his patent could be issued before this change of ruling was made by the Department. I read that decision yesterday.

Mr. MERRIMON. But if the right had accrued how could he divest it, and how could any ruling he has made affect it?

Mr. HARVEY. How can the settler assert it? He has no evidence of title. I stated that.

Mr. MERRIMON. If he has any right, he has a standing certainly in some appropriate court.

Mr. HARVEY. But his evidence of title is gone. The Department has canceled and rendered nugatory the evidence which he had already obtained under a former ruling.

Mr. INGALLS. If it will not interrupt the honorable Senator from North Carolina, I should like to state on that very point that not only has the settler no right in court, no means of getting into court, no right of appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, but that on two or three separate occasions I have appealed to the Attorney-General of the United States to make a case in behalf of the settlers in the name of the Government against the railroad corporations to have this very question tried, and I have been uniformly refused.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why has not the claimant a standing in court?

Mr. INGALLS. Because he has no evidence of title. His right of settlement could only be tried in an action of ejectment.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then he has no right; and how is it possible for Congress to divest a right that has vested in a railroad company and place it in him?

Mr. INGALLS. We claim that it has not vested.

Mr. SARGENT. The companies hold by a species of vacancy, by intruding into a vacancy. Will the Senator allow me to read a single clause from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will, because I really desire information. I want to give relief if it can be done, but I do not want to walk over even corporations' rights.

Mr. SARGENT. I respect the Senator's scruples. I wish to show him that so far from a pre-emptor having any standing in court or any vested right even, in the opinion of the Supreme Court he is treated as having no right whatever of any kind, although he may have complied fully with all the points of the pre-emption law up to the time——

Mr. MERRIMON. Then will the Senator tell me how we can create the right in him by law?

Mr. SARGENT. Because by the policy of the law and the equity in law the right exists. I should like to show the Senator the statute under which I say the right accrues, and then show him how it has been treated by the judicial authorities. I should like to give effect to the statute.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want information.

Mr. SARGENT. The law of 1841, which in the particulars to which I refer never has been repealed, provides that—

> Every person, being the head of a family or widow, or single person, over the age of twenty-one years, and a citizen of the United States, or having filed a declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws, who has made, or hereafter makes, a settlement in person on the public lands subject to pre-emption, and who inhabits and improves the same, and who has erected or shall erect a dwelling thereon, is authorized to enter with the register of the land office for the district in which such land lies, by legal subdivisions, any number of acres not exceeding one hundred and sixty, or a quarter section of land, to include the residence of such claimant, upon paying to the United States the minimum price of such land.

Observe, he is required to make all these improvements; but he cannot pay for the land until the survey is made; and before the survey is made the Supreme Court in the case of Frisbie vs. Whitney, where the matter came to the attention of that tribunal, says the pre-emptor has no rights, because he has paid no money. He could not pay it, because under another section, which I will read to the Senator if he desires, he is not allowed to make his tender to the land office and pay the money until after the survey is made of the land into subdivisions by the United States, which will show exactly where the tract is situated. The Supreme Court says, referring to this pre-emptor:

> What had he done? He had gone upon the land, built a house and barn, and perhaps inclosed some of the ground.

They speak of it a little lightly. They admit that he had gone on the land, built a house, a barn, and perhaps inclosed some of the land.

> He had also applied to the register of the land office and offered to make a declaration that he had done these things with the intention of making a permanent settlement, and claiming the land under the right of pre-emption. This is all. He had paid no money, nor had he then tendered any. The land officers refused to receive his declaration and denied his right to pre-empt the land. He never has paid any money, has never received any certificate of pre-emption, and the register and receiver have never, in any manner, acknowledged or admitted his right to make pre-emption of that land. So far as anything done by him is to be considered, his claim rests solely upon his going upon the land and building and residing upon it.

Those are the very things which the United States required him to do; and did not some right vest in him by virtue of that? And yet the court say:

> There is nothing in the essential nature of these acts to confer a vested right, or indeed any kind of claim to land, and it is necessary to resort to the pre-emption law to make out any shadow of such right.

They deny that there is any such right. I say that under a decision of the Supreme Court like this, may not a Secretary of the Interior or a Commissioner of the General Land Office fall into the same vein and say "these parties have no rights?" Suppose a person thus under the encouragement of the law of 1841, never repealed, still in force, goes on and makes these improvements on the public lands; if somebody afterward comes in and procures, even surreptitiously, a patent for that tract of land, what then? The Supreme Court by various decisions have declared that a pre-emptor who has not actually received his patent has not a standing in court. I can show this to the Senator further from 15 Wallace, where this case of Frisbie vs. Whitney is passed upon in the Yosemite Valley case, where the person, beyond all dispute, as I understand the facts, was in possession, and had been for years. Though that was so, the United States subsequently gave the land to the State of California, thus cutting out, right from under his feet, the land of the pre-emptor. The State of California saw that injustice was done by this, and by its Legislature passed a law that it would itself give this land to the pre-emptor. It did not desire to deprive Mr. Hutchins of his land, the man who had called the attention of the world to the valley and had made there his improvements. This man being thrown out by this means, the State of California desired to render him justice; but on the plea of the commissioners having charge, the Supreme Court decided that, although he had made this settlement and acted in good faith all the way through, still he had no title to the land, no vested right whatever, and disregarded any claim under the pre-emption law, and threw him out.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is just as I understood. The courts have decided that these persons have no standing in court, because they have no right.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now, if they have no right and an act of Congress has created a right in a corporation touching those very lands, how can we pass a bill divesting that right?

Mr. SARGENT. In the first place, the right has not inhered in the corporation. Take the case under the second section, which I referred to yesterday, where by the original grant to the corporation these lands were excepted, and consequently the right would not exist; but it came forward and asserted a right to them, and, under the ruling of the Land Office, procured a listing of the lands to them, which connects them with the title of the United States incorrectly, improperly, without any foundation in equity or in justice or in law; but then it goes into court and establishes it; and the settler comes in and says: "Here, I am entitled to this; by the law of Congress, by every principle of fair dealing, I am entitled to it, and a court of equity should require the title to be made to me, should require the railroad company to hold it for my benefit;" though he might well say all these things, he cannot be a party in court, because he has no paper title, no paper showing him connected with the title before that time. That is the trouble. He has no evidence of title. The title may exist in him by every principle of right and equity, and a court of equity, if it could get at it, would decree it to him, and the other party to be his trustee.

Mr. MERRIMON. He has no paper title; but he has a right under the statute if he has done what the law required him to do.

Mr. SARGENT. But they will not recognize him as a party to assert that right, because, they say, he is not connected with the title. They even use words declaring that he is a mere trespasser. There is the trouble which we wish to cure.

Mr. MERRIMON. I confess I am not prepared to vote. I do not want to vote against the bill, and as I see the matter now, I am not prepared to vote for it. I trust therefore that it will be recommitted to some committee, or adjourned over until we can look into it, or I can look into it with more care. If I am compelled to vote now, I fear I shall have to vote against the bill.

Then I take this point further. My impression is that if the bill passes it will not accomplish what the friends of the bill desire to accomplish, but it may be that it will have the effect to commit the Government to compensate these pre-emptors and other claimants hereafter for what they insist they are in justice and good faith entitled to. How far the bill may have that effect I do not undertake to say; but I would not like to give a vote that would commit the Government to that, especially with the matter standing as I now understand it.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to add merely another word. I know that delays are always easy. This bill was dragged along through both sessions of the last Congress, having been favorably reported upon by the Committee on Public Lands, who gave it full and fair investigation. We never could come to a time when it seemed proper to vote upon it. Now it is proposed that it be referred to another committee, as if we had not confidence in the Committee on Public Lands; a proposition which seems to me in effect, although that may not be its intention, to reflect upon that committee. Then again it is proposed that it be set down as a special order for a certain day when every one knows that a special order has no particular sanctity in the Senate and may be set aside by unfinished business, and so it may drift along through the whole session and this measure of relief may not be reached finally, as it was not reached during the last Congress.

Now this matter has been fully debated here for some twenty-four hours. Senators have had an opportunity to carefully examine it. The objections against the bill have been answered, it seems to me, or at any rate we have attempted to answer them; and if Senators' minds are not made up that they can vote for the bill, I see no other course for them but to vote against it. I believe, however, that a majority of Senators on this floor are satisfied that this is a just and correct measure; that it involves no consequences of compensation against the Government by merely relieving the parties who are oppressed by the operation of the construction of our laws, and giving them an opportunity to go into court and establish their rights—to stand the individual citizen, humble as he may be, upon the same level in court as a corporation. That is all that this bill does. It simply gives him the paper evidence connecting him with the title of the Government of the United States, by which he may be treated otherwise than as a trespasser by the Supreme Court or any other court of the United States, and by virtue of that protection establish his rights, if he has any, and if he has none, have an adverse decision against him.

There is more in this debate and there is more in this bill than appears on the surface. I say, sir, the question we are deciding to-day is not simply the right of here and there a man, but it is the right of the citizen as against the corporation. That is the proposition; that is the shadow which now rests upon this Hall—whether corporate power is greater in the Senate of the United States and in the Congress of the United States, or whether the right of the citizen is the greater. I do not believe in infringing the rights of corporations. Where they have rights, I would protect them; but it is no infringement of their rights to make them contestants in an action against a person who has a right which he claims that they infringe; that he had property of which they unjustly have deprived him. That is only the fairness and equality to which all men are entitled under the law; and I say it will be a sad day for many western homes and it will be a sad day for the whole country when it shall be understood that there is any power in the country so powerful by the accumulation of capital or by any far-reaching influence that it can dictate the laws which shall be made from the Capitol, and be enabled with impunity to trample down the rights of the citizen. I say that all we ask is an opportunity for the settlers to show that by a fair construction of the law they are entitled to their homesteads, to be heard before the courts in defense of that claim. Gentlemen may find all sorts of ingenious arguments, and may advance all kinds of technicalities, and may express timidity for fear these powerful corporations may be hurt; but I say to them there is no danger of that. They are prepared, fully armed and equipped, with the ablest counsel in the Senate and out of the Senate to advocate their claims before the courts of the United States, and they have overflowing treasuries; they have all the means which are necessary in order to vindicate their rights; and as against them, I ask, not infringing their rights, that the opportunity may be accorded to the settler to vindicate himself with such feeble means as may be in his power before the courts of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I think myself that it will be a sad day for the country when it shall come to believe that the legislation of the land is conducted under the shadow of corporate power and corporate authority. I indulge the hope, however, that that day will not come until somebody, here or elsewhere, asserts the fact. Outside the Chamber I believe no such fact has been advertised as yet. I trust it will not for the first time be proclaimed on this floor. I have myself seen no evidence whatever that the influence of corporations pervaded this Chamber or influenced the course of this debate. I hope such is not the fact.

The simple purpose which is avowed here to be the object of the first section of the bill, and the main purpose of the bill, is an object so manifestly just and fair, that there are no two Senators on this floor who would differ on it. What is that purpose? To meet this case it is said; the case of an unfortunate and uninformed settler, who under the operation of your homestead or your pre-emption laws shall have attempted to make himself a home on a tract of land within the limits covered by a grant to a railroad without knowledge of that grant.

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator pardon me for asking a question? If he is so unfortunate as to be misinformed, whose fault is it, if the records which the Government keeps in the land district misinform him?

Mr. HOWE. Not his fault, not the fault of the settler. The Senator misapprehends me. I am stating what I understand to be the purpose of the first section of the bill in order to maintain what I before said, that so far as that purpose is concerned there are no Senators on this floor who differ about the propriety of it. That purpose is to take care of the unfortunate and uninformed settler who, not knowing of the grant, had gone on a tract within its limits to make himself a home. Now, of course there is not a man on this floor who would dare to vote for a bill making a grant of that tract of land after the settler had commenced to make his home upon it. The Senator from Kansas does not know of such a man; the Senator from California does not know of such a man in this Chamber. No Senator here knowing of that settlement would dare to vote for a bill granting that tract of land to a railroad company or anybody else. Therefore I conclude if it be still within the purview of legislative power, if it be still within the province of the Legislature to say in reference to such a tract which has been so settled upon and afterward covered by a grant, the settlement having been made without knowledge of the grant and the grant having been made without knowledge of the settlement—if it be within the purview of legislative power to say to which of these two parties the land shall belong hereafter, there are no two Senators on this floor who would hesitate to say that it should go to the settler and not to the railroad grantee, not to the corporation. The settler has paid something equivalent to a consideration; the corporation has paid nothing equivalent to a consideration. Besides, there is in the Senate Chamber, thank God, as outside the Senate Chamber, still a sympathy and a feeling for the weak which does not exist as for the strong, and which would prompt, not a part of the Senate, but I am happy to believe the whole of the Senate, when there rests with us a volition of giving or withholding, to give to the weak and not to the strong, to give to the poor and not to the rich.

For these reasons I venture to say that so far as the avowed purpose of the first clause of the first section of the bill is concerned Senators do not differ as to what is proper to be done. There may be a difference of opinion as to what the legislative power can do, and there may be a difference of opinion as to what is necessary to be done. I have listened to the Senator from California, the Senator from Kansas, and other Senators, with a view of understanding precisely what is the necessity for this bill. I am only obliged to say that I do not yet understand what that necessity is. If in pursuance of existing law A or B take possession of a quarter section of land and make what you call a pre-emption settlement upon it, or a homestead settlement upon it, complying with the provisions of law, the moment he has done the preliminary things which give him the character of a homestead settler or the character of a pre-emptor, as I did understand before this debate commenced, he had clothed himself with a right which the courts would protect, which legislation is not needed to protect, and which legislation can do nothing to divest from him. Such was my understanding before this debate.

Mr. SARGENT. Did the Senator listen to the extract which I read from a decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. HOWE. I was writing at the time, and I am not sure that I heard the whole of it; yes, I know I did not hear the whole of it.

Mr. SARGENT. They say in that case that compliance with the pre-emption laws confers no vested right.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator, I think, had a case before him which was not a case of pre-emption.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I will give you the case of the Yosemite Valley, which was a case of pre-emption. The case of Frisbie vs. Whitney, from which I read, was a pre-emption case, I think. I am familiar with the case, as it arose in my State, and I can state it in a minute.

Mr. HOWE. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. SARGENT. The case of Whitney was a case where there was a settlement on land which had been claimed as a Mexican grant—the Soscol ranch; the Mexican grant declared to be fraudulent, made without any authority of law by the Mexican authorities or not made at all. My impression is that it was declared to be a fraudulent grant. At any rate it was vacated by the Supreme Court of the United States. This led the people to suppose that the land thereby became public land and open to pre-emption and settlement. I should think that any person of pretty good intelligence would so conceive. Certain lands in California were supposed to be held under a Mexican grant, and that Mexican grant itself was by the Supreme Court of the United States declared to be absolutely void, so that the land was public land. Then persons of pretty good disposition and considerable average intelligence, under those circumstances, after this decision had been made and had been acquiesced in by all parties, entered upon this land as pre-emptors. A subsequent session of Congress, however, said that the persons who had claimed under the void and fraudulent Mexican grant should have a right to buy it for one dollar and a quarter an acre, and they came in and bought it, and the settlers consequently were ousted and thrown out. These men came in then and claimed under the pre-emption law, Whitney among others, whose case was here decided; and the Supreme Court said this: What did he do? He built a house, and he built a barn, and he may have made some other improvements; but all that did not confer any vested right; and to create any shadow of right he must refer to the pre-emption laws. I render the decision exactly. If the Senator doubts it I can read it; it is in the RECORD already; or I will hand it to him. Thus the case I referred to did arise under the pre-emption laws; and if it had not arisen under the pre-emption laws, or did not involve the validity of a law of the United States, all the parties being resident of the State of California, it could not have got to the Supreme Court at all. In the Yosemite case the claim of Mr. Hutchins was a pre-emption claim; and in that decision the court review the case of Frisbie vs. Whitney and re-affirm it, and argue in the same direction even more strongly that even a compliance with the law of 1841, which is the law to-day, by building a residence, and having children born there, does not confer any right when the settler has not actually paid for the land, though he cannot pay for it before it is surveyed.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator confirms the impression I had when I sat down—it was no more than an impression—that there was no pre-emption in the Whitney case. There was a settlement; but the land officers did not hold the land to be subject to pre-emption. There was a mere squatting, not in accordance with any law in the world. I was stating an entirely different case. Here is a quarter section of land in the State of Nebraska which the laws proclaim to be open to settlement under the pre-emption and homestead laws or to entry under the laws for the sale of the public domain. When I go on to that quarter section of land in pursuance of law and make my settlement and give notice of my purpose to pre-empt it, which the land office records, there is a contract to that extent between myself and the Government of the United States. I do not think it needs any protection on thepart of Congress; and I say again what I said before, that Congress cannot disturb it. That is my judgment. I speak with diffidence and with deference to the opinions of others, but that is my judgment.

Sir, you talk about evidence of title and the necessity of it to give you a standing in court. What better or higher evidence of title do you want than the statutes of the land? Is the patent written on parchment and signed by your President better evidence of title than the statute?

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator permit me to ask whether the statute identifies the person in court as the one having a right to a particular tract?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; it does not identify that individual, but that individual may be made certain by evidence outside of the statute, and is. It does not convey a legal title. The Senator from Kansas, the colleague of the Senator who just interrupted me, says that this question must be tried in an action of ejectment. Certainly not. There are other forms of trial which can determine this question. I myself have on behalf of a client, in a suit in equity, recovered against a patentee a tract of land on behalf of a man claiming simply under the statute without any patent. I did not do it in an action of ejectment, but I did do it by bill in equity. And although I was not attorney in the case to which I am about to refer, a similar recovery was had of another tract of land, which was finally confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. You will find it in one of the volumes of Howard's Reports, the case of Grignon's Assignee vs. Astor, I think.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him one question? I can very well conceive a case—and I know there have been many cases—where bills in equity have been brought to set aside patents and in favor of those who claimed adversely to patents and who perhaps had nothing more than a mere settlement right. But I think that a majority of those cases will be found to be instances where it was claimed that the patent had been fraudulently issued. I think that will be found to be so. But the inquiry that I propose to propound to the Senator is this: Whether, if a party comes into court with his patent, standing upon his legal title, he now unquestionably has that legal title which will dispossess the person in possession.

Mr. HOWE. In ejectment?

Mr. WRIGHT. In ejectment. I can conceive of many cases where the person thus in possession may by bill in equity set aside the patent and resist this ejectment proceeding; of course before the case had proceeded to trial and judgment in the law action. But now I submit this question: Suppose the party recovers in his ejectment proceeding, and the settler proposes to come in under the occupying-claimant law, which obtains in the Senator's State as in mine, to recover for his improvements; does he think that the settler, either as a pre-emptioner or a homesteader, would have such color of title as that he could be heard in a court of equity to recover for his improvements?

Mr. HOWE. That law in my State, if I remember it, guides only on the trial of actions of ejectment, suits at law, and therefore it could not obtain in this case. I would advise the pre-emptor, instead of giving judgment to the plaintiff in ejectment, to stand on his equitable title and enforce it, and not rely upon a recovery for his improvements.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator, of course, will agree with me that the settler or person who relies on color of title after judgment can have proceedings suspended upon the judgment in favor of the complainant in the action establishing the legal title and prevent the writ issuing to dispossess him by filing his bill and asking compensation for his improvements.

Mr. HOWE. That would not be the practice in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is the practice, as far as I know, in most of the States who allow claims under the betterment act or the act providing compensation for occupying claimants. They have to rely upon a color of title. If they have not a color of title, of course they can have no claim against the person holding the legal title.

Mr. HOWE. There are two reasons why I do not wish to continue this part of the discussion. One reason is that there is being injected into it so much learning that, if it goes much further, I shall have to disclose how little I have, [laughter;] and the other reason is that really it was not this part of the bill that interested me, and I should not have commented upon it at all but for the purpose of saying that I did not believe the corporations were giving guidance to our deliberations or were likely to control our votes here. I do not care to insist upon the suggestion I threw out, that these settlers do not need protection, nor to insist that we cannot give them protection. I am perfectly willing to make the attempt. If it is seriously believed that a commandment of ours will do them good, I assent to it. What called me to my feet mainly, though, was to make the suggestion that I think, not exactly with the Senator from Missouri yesterday, that this bill does not do what its friends want it to do—I thinkthe Senator was right to some extent in that—but I think the bill will do some things which its friends do not want it to do, and which I do not want it to do.

I wish to call the attention of the friends of the bill especially to the tenth and eleventh lines of the first section. The previous lines of this section having undertaken to provide for the settler and to say that his title shall be good and valid as against a grant which might be made to a railroad company, the tenth and eleventh lines say that, after the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall have restored a grant to market, then the settler may take possession either under your homestead or pre-emption laws, or that any one desiring to purchase may enter at private sale. I do not think the friends of the bill mean to say that. That raises a question which is of a good deal of interest to the State of Wisconsin. In 1856 you made a grant of lands to the State of Wisconsin to build certain railways, in all from three to four hundred miles. The roads have not been completed. There is but a small portion left to be completed, but the time within which the completion was to be effected has expired several years since. The work of construction still goes on. There are those who have held that the Commissioner of the General Land Office might restore those lands to market, and there are those who have held that the lands were in market and that the title of the State was completely divested by the mere failure to complete; and it was that supposition or that theory of law which gave rise to the controversy settled in the decision read by the Senator from Oregon yesterday. The men who cut the timber supposed the title of the State was divested; that the failure to complete the road within the time limited by the act terminated the claim of the State, the title of the State, and they went on and cut timber. The court held that that did not determine the title of the State; that whether a conditional title was or was not forfeited was a question to be determined by the judicial or by the legislative tribunals of the country; and it is a question, as you see, of considerable moment to the State of Wisconsin. It is of great moment to the State of Wisconsin that you shall reserve to yourselves or reserve to the courts—one of the two alone—the power to say whether you will withdraw those lands from the State of Wisconsin or not. These two lines commit that authority to the General Land Office.

Mr. SHERMAN. To the President.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; to the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. SHERMAN. By law no land can be restored to public sale and entry except by a proclamation of the President.

Mr. HOWE. I admit that, but after you pass those two lines the Commissioner can do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill confers no power upon the Land Office, as I understand it. It simply says "after their restoration to market by the General Land Office," but under the law they cannot be restored by the General Land Office until after proclamation made by the President.

Mr. HOWE. This will be held to be a grant of power, I venture to predict. If the question be whether it is a grant of power or not, I shall refer that to a lawyer; but being simply a prophet, not a lawyer, I do not undertake to say how it can be that.

Mr. President, I want the friends of the bill to consent to an amendment which I send to the Chair to be added as a proviso to the first section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add to the first section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the title which the State of Wisconsin, or its assigns, may have to lands granted to that State by the act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856, and the acts amendatory thereof, but such title shall remain as valid as the same now is.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator think that the administration of the grant in Wisconsin is liable to the objection made by the friends of this bill, that settlers have been ousted and have been treated in the manner we have alleged?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; but by the tenth and eleventh lines, to which I called the attention of the Senator from California and others, the bill seems to me to give to the Commissioner expressly the authority to say that the title of the State of Wisconsin to those lands is forfeited, and to restore them to market by an order that he may make.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, I think he misapprehends the scope of the clause entirely. It only saves the rights of such settlers as may have settled upon lands after they have been restored by order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. HOWE. The title of the settlers or the title of the purchasers? When the Commissioner has returned the lands to market by his order, then they are open to settlement by a pre-emptor or a homestead claimant, or open to entry.

Mr. SARGENT. Were those lands ever declared to be restored by the Commissioner of the Land Office?

Mr. HOWE. They never have been.

Mr. SARGENT. And they never will be under this bill.

Mr. HOWE. Why so?

Mr. SARGENT. Because the Supreme Court of the United States has said that it does not possess the power to so declare; that it must be done by Congress or by judicial action. This simply refers to cases where the power was attempted to be used, and settlers have entered upon the faith that it was properly used.

Mr. HOWE. But the friends of the bill insist upon giving that power.

Mr. SARGENT. I think not, unless the Senator considers himself a friend of the bill, which I should judge him not to be by his remarks.

Mr. HOWE. I did not speak of myself in that category at this time. The yeas and nays, the journals of the Senate will determine in the end whether I belong to that category or not, and the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from California will not be excluded from the list of the friends of this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Thank you. I would make a suggestion to the Senator which would perhaps meet his point just as well and not complicate the bill; and that is, to provide, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, that hereafter the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall not declare such lands restored without authority of Congress. That would cover the Senator's case, and would cover all similar cases, and would not extend the power of the Commissioner.

Mr. HOWE. If you can put that in and make a better piece of surgery of it, very well; but it strikes me that my own proviso is about as neat a piece as we can get.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will accept a proposition of that kind, I have no objection to offer to it.

Mr. HOWE. What is the objection to mine?

Mr. SARGENT. That it points out a particular case to which the bill really does not apply, and if an exception is made in one case we may find an exception made in another, one for the Central Pacific Railroad, and next for the Texas Pacific Railroad, and then another railroad, and finally we shall except all the land grants from its operation. I object to it simply as a precedent.

Mr. HARVEY. I can see no necessity for the amendment proposed. I think a careful reading of the first section will satisfy the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senate that there is no necessity for an amendment of that kind. It enacts:

That all pre-emption and homestead entries, or entries in compliance with any law of the United States, of the public lands, made in good faith, by actual settlers, upon tracts of land of not more than one hundred and sixty acres each, within the limits of any land grant, prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated, or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office, and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with, and proper proofs thereof have been made by parties holding such tracts or parcels, they shall be confirmed, and patents for the same shall issue to the parties entitled thereto.

This refers entirely to things in the past——

Mr. HOWE. The Senator's colleague says it does not; that it refers to things in the future as well; that it is a general law.

Mr. HARVEY. It is a general law of course in that it has no application to particular cases or instances, as, for example, those in a certain State or district; but as I understand the bill it refers simply to cases of the kind set forth here as having occurred.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me one moment, let us put ourselves ten years ahead. This act then speaks on the statute-book on that day touching everything that has occurred up to that time. Is it not to be a continuing act, and do not the words always speak as of the day when you read them, that all entries made "prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received?"

Mr. HARVEY. It will be generally conceded that this system of land grants is a thing of the past, and the object of this section is simply to remedy the wrongs which have resulted from its operation.

Mr. CONKLING. Then why do you not say "received before the passage of this act?"

Mr. HARVEY. I have stated the object of this bill as I understand it. I will state further that it had its origin originally in the House of Representatives, was passed by the House during the last session, and the purpose then was, as I stated yesterday, to remedy the great wrongs to settlers from a certain decision of the Interior Department, of which I will read a portion again for the satisfaction of the Senator from New York and of the Senate:

These filings were made before the withdrawal of the lands, but under the construction now adopted by this Department the right of the railroad attached at the time of definite location, and not, as formerly held, at the time of withdrawal. No patents have been executed, and under the law, as I understand it, and the rule above stated, the right of the railroad is superior to that of other parties, and your decision should be reversed.

The letter was directed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who had decided, in accordance with the law and in accordance with the former regulations of the Department, that the claimants who had complied with the laws of the United States were entitled to their patents. This decision was made without any change of the law, reversing the operation and effect of the law under former rulings, and excluding, by its very terms, from the benefits of the law the settler who had before complied fully not only with the law, but with the requirements in every respect made by the Department. The Secretary proceeds:

I therefore reverse the same, and herewith return the papers transmitted with your letter of April 14, 1873.

Now, if I understand the ground which the Senator from Wisconsin takes, and I invite his attention for a moment, it is that this decision must be permitted to stand, and the settler who had complied fully with the laws of the United States must be content, not with the evidence of title which the Government agreed to give him on his compliance with the law, but must be content to go into court without the statute, and hunt up as he can find it evidence outside of the record to prove by Tom, Dick, or Harry, or John Doe and Richard Roe, that he was the person who made settlement on a particular tract of land and paid the fee, which the Government required him to do, and complied with all the other requisitions that the Government made upon him. The object of this bill, and the only object, is to vindicate the right of those citizens who have complied with the laws. It has no other purpose.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, as I had occasion when a member of the Committee on Public Lands to consider this question, and as, after listening to this debate, I entertain the opinion that I then had, it may not be out of place for me to state briefly the reasons for it.

I think it just to say to the Senate that we are asked in this bill to deal with titles to lands which have been granted already by the United States according to the forms of law, and to deal with them by issuing other titles to different persons for precisely the same tracts of land, those evidences of title to be in every respect, except as to date, like those heretofore issued. I believe that is an exact statement of the proposition that is now submitted to the Senate. The reasons for it, as I understand them, are, first, (and this I believe is true,) that the General Land Office did, under regulations which are now held to have been then without authority of law, permit persons to go upon lands covered by grants to various railroads between the time when those grants were perfected and the title under the statutes made to attach to particular sections and the time when the knowledge that such grants had been perfected by the location of the roads was communicated to the local land offices. The first section of the bill covers in terms a large class of cases; but an examination of the phraseology of the section, in connection with well-known facts about which there is no dispute, limits the application of the phraseology to a particular class of persons, whose character in reference to settlement upon the public lands is also well known. The language is—

That all pre-emption and homestead entries, or entries in compliance with any law of the United States, of the public lands, made in good faith by actual settlers upon tracts of land of not more than one hundred and sixty acres each, within the limits of any land grant, prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated—

are to be made valid, as far as they can be, by this proposed act of Congress. This covers the case of any and every settler whose location was made previous to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands from market was received at the local land office. But we can divide upon well-known facts those who made these settlements into two classes: first, those settlers whose entries were made previous to the time when the right of the railroad company became a fixed right to particular lands and, second, those who made settlements after that period of time. I do not at this moment discuss when that time was, but, as regards all those whose entries were made previous to the time when the legal rights of the railways attached to particular tracts of land, they neither ask nor need any relief, because their titles are perfect and, as far as the railroads are concerned, cannot be in dispute. There is another class who made entries upon the lands after the time when, as it is now believed, the legal right of the railroad was fixed. The grants were in præsenti, as first the Attorney-General in 1856 held. The Supreme Court has since repeatedly held that the grants to the various railroads or to the States for the benefit of railroads were in præsenti, but the title was a floating title, which would be fixed when a certain other thing was done. The question is whether that particular thing to be done by which the title of the railroad attached to particular sections was when notice reached the local land offices of the withdrawal or whether it was upon the happening of some preceding event.

It is said that the rule of the Land Office has been different in different cases. I have already admitted that there was an erroneous construction of the law, and persons no doubt were induced to make entries upon lands under the impression that they would secure a valid title, when as a matter of fact the instructions of the Land Office were erroneous. But there is still another statement which is, as far as I know, not so well supported by facts. It is said that the General Land Office has made different regulations in regard to the different statutes under which grants were made, and complaint is made of that fact. This is true, because the statutes themselves provided a different time when the grants made to various railroads should attach to particular tracts of land, and therefore the regulations in different cases were based upon different statutes and differed. I have before me the statutes, and I think it well enough to call the attention of the Senate to the different language employed in them. In the eleventh volume of the Statutes at Large, page 9, in an act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, &c., this phraseology is used:

But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of said roads are definitely fixed, sold any sections, &c.

The phrase "definitely fixed" is there used, and the Supreme Court in 9 Wallace, in the case of the Railroad Company vs. Fremont County, decided, or rather used language which I think in the case is equivalent to a decision, interpreting that language for purposes not only of the Land Office, but I think for purposes of legislation. The question was not before the court, but the point before the court, as I understand it, was whether certain swamp lands that had been granted to the State were included within the grant made to a railroad or not; and therefore in order to settle that question it became necessary to ascertain when the title of the railroad attached to particular sections so as to save them from settlement, and Judge Nelson for the court says——

Mr. INGALLS. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I read from 9 Wallace, pages 94 and 95. Judge Nelson says:

Until the line of the railroad was definitely fixed upon the ground there could be no certainty as to the particular sections of land falling within the grant; nor could the title to any particular section on the line of the road vest in the company. The grant was in the nature of a float until this line was permanently fixed. Now—the proofs show that the location of the road was not made on the ground and adopted by the company till the 24th March, 1857.

He says—

That, I think, may be treated as the opinion of the court, inasmuch as the question before the court could not be settled without the court finding, first, the day when this floating title became fixed, and that was the day when the railroad company adopted the line of road surveyed and laid out by the engineers; and it had no relation to, indeed it antedated, the time when notice could have reached the local land offices. Therefore, I consider that question settled. Now, then, taking this particular case, the statute of 1856, and the decisions of the Supreme Court upon it, nothing can be clearer, it seems to me, as a matter of law, than this: that the settlers who went upon these lands after the 24th day of March, 1857, and before notice of the location of the road, which was legally made on that day, reached the local land offices, have no legal title to the lands on which they located themselves, but that those lands are legally vested in the railway company.

Mr. INGALLS. The Secretaries of the Interior held a contrary opinion up to 1871.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Supreme Court held otherwise. I am not able to say what the Secretary of the Interior might have held in 1871. Then there were other cases.

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator pardon me in calling his attention to the fact that a while ago, at the beginning of his speech, he spoke against the idea of issuing more than one patent for a particular tract of land? He admits that up to a certain time in 1871 the practice of the Interior Department was diametrically different in this respect from what it is now; that the patents were issued upon a different construction of the law and in pursuance of different rulings as to the settlers up to that time. After that time the new ruling was adopted, and the settlers were refused their patents, their original papers were canceled, and the patents were issued to the railroad companies, going clear back over the same time, so that they adjudicated for the benefit of the railroad companies, and not for the settlers.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have not admitted anything of that sort.

Mr. SARGENT. That is the fact.

Mr. BOUTWELL. On the contrary, I think the Secretary of the Interior, and I believe I have his decision here——

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator will pardon me, I will finish the question I intended to ask, which is simply this: If the Department of the Interior issued patents upon one construction of the law at one time up to a certain day and upon a different and diametrically opposite construction afterward, is the Department necessarily right all the time, and must there be no question as to the correctness of its rulings?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have this to say in regard to the Department: I do not purpose to discuss its doings in detail, as to whether it may have been right or wrong. I am trying to find, if possible, the legal standing of these claimants and of the railway companies as adverse claimants. The Department may have done all that the friends of this bill say, and even more, to the injury of the settlers, and it may be reason for great complaint on their part, and a reason even why we should furnish redress in some form or other, either by money out of the Treasury or lands from the public domain for the relief of these people; but it may not furnish a reason why we should undertake to do a thing as a part of the legislative branch of the Government, knowing that it will have no legal value when it is done, and only involve the settlers, whom it is the purpose of the friends of this bill to relieve, in greater difficulties than they now find themselves.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I would like to ask the Senator if it is not a cruelty to the settler to refuse him, according to that decision made in behalf of railroad companies, the opportunity to go into court, and further, if he has any means of asserting his rights, except by showing some species of paper title which the court itself will not hold to be good?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am for giving the settlers an opportunity to go into court.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I shall listen with pleasure to the Senator's statement of any means by which the settler can get into court.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But what I desire now to say is that one of two things will happen. If you grant patents to settlers, claimants for lands for which patents have already been issued to railroad companies, and these parties go into court, one or the other will be defeated. Yesterday the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] in reply to a question which I put to him, gave us to understand that in his opinion the railway companies would be defeated. I know not how that may be. My impression is otherwise: that if the Supreme Court held to the opinion I have read from the case of the Railroad Company vs. Fremont they must hold that the right of the railway attached to the lands at the time when the location was adopted by the railway company, and has no reference to the time when notice was received at the local land offices. Therefore, I believe that these parties to whom you propose to give a standing in court will be defeated; that they will be induced by the issue of these patents to incur additional expenses in the improvement of the lands which they are now occupying; that they will be compelled to litigate these questions in court against rich corporations, and will be finally beaten; and they will then come with an additional claim to the Government of the United States to be re-imbursed, not only for the expenses to which they have been subjected heretofore, but especially for those they have incurred in consequence of what I think would be our improvident legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to interrupt him just there, as he pauses? I have some recollection of the case of the Railroad Company vs. Fremont County, to which he refers, and I beg to suggest to him that the court in that case only undertook to decide the question before it. Of course it had no right to decide anything more. The question as to whether the right of the company as against settlers could only attach from the time the lands were withdrawn from market was really not before the court. It was only called upon to decide in connection with the claim by the county for certain swamp lands that the title attached to the railroad company at a particular time, and, inasmuch as it attached at that time, that it could not interfere with the rights of the county. But the other question, as to whether the right attached and could only attach from the time the lands were withdrawn, was not before the court. I submit this to the Senator as a matter of pure argument.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have stated perhaps as much as that, but I have stated also what perhaps the honorable Senator from Iowa did not observe, that I do not see how it was possible for the court to find whether the lands belonged to the county claiming these swamp lands under a grant to the State or the railroad company claiming the lands under the railway grant, unless they first found the date when the floating claims of the railway attached to particular sections, and as a matter of fact they did name a day when these floating titles attached to particular sections, and the day named was in fact, as stated by the court, the day when the railroad corporation did approve a particular line which had previously been surveyed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can very well see that the deduction of the Senator from the circumstances of the case may be correct; but I think he will agree with me that there might be a fair and legitimate argument drawn if the question had been between settlers and the railroad company, the one insisting upon a different date from that fixed by the Supreme Court. In other words, the decision does not necessarily conclude a question raised between different parties under different circumstances.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That must be upon the ground that nothing is concluded as a matter of law. I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter addressed to the Committee on Public Lands last year on this subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 25, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference from you personally of House bill No. 3250, to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department, which passed the House 11th instant.

If I correctly understand the purport and intent of the bill, it simply proposes in the first section to enact at this time a provision which in my judgment might with propriety have been made a condition in all acts making grants for railroad purposes.

But as those laws have been passed, and rights have vested under them according to their express signification, and many of them have already been construed by the courts to fix the date of actual location of the line of the roads as the time when title vested to the lands granted, without regard to date of withdrawal, I do not see how a legislative declaration at this time can defeat such right, or give to settlers who have unfortunately gone upon the lands subsequent to such date a superior title to that of the railroad companies.

Should the courts after all hold, notwithstanding such declaration by Congress, that the better title is in the company receiving the grant, great wrong will have been done the settlers by inviting them to make further improvements and receiving further evidences of title by the issue of patent.

As the holding of certificates of entry will in most of the States enable suits to be maintained for a judicial determination of the question of title, I am of the opinion that it should not be further complicated by the passage of an act that will compel this Department, in violation of its understanding of the laws governing the adjustment of cases coming before it, to issue patent for claims that without the act would be deemed illegal and clearly in conflict with rights already vested at their inception.

The second section can have no application, for the reason that no necessity exists for the confirmation of entries permitted upon lands excepted from the grant by valid claims existing at date of definite location; and if the withdrawal was subsequent to location of the road, a claim valid at the date of withdrawal must have been also valid at the prior date, and entries made upon lands in that condition are approved as a matter of course under the present laws. If the withdrawal was prior to the definite location and the claim was abandoned prior to such location, the Department has not ruled that subsequent entries should be allowed; and if in any case such entry has been permitted, it has been in violation of the rules, and clearly erroneous.

If these errors could be cured by legislation without conflict with vested rights, they could be reached without additional legislation, under the acts of 1846 and 1856, conferring equitable powers upon the Department.

I am unaware of any cases existing in the Department which would be affected by the third section, and see no impropriety in its provisions, unless it may be held to revive claims already passed upon and settled, and disturb titles already passed out of the Government under previous adjustments, or unless Congress may have revived some grant once expired, without making conditions for such claims, and have vested title without reserve in the company receiving it. In such case I cannot recommend the destruction of legal titles for the purpose of recognizing mere equitable rights founded upon misconstruction of law and originating in mistakes of either Department or legislative officers.

The bill in its present form seems to be broad enough to cover cases running back indefinitely, and to restore entries canceled years ago, where lands have already been patented under the railroad grants, and where title may have been a matter of transfer for years between the successive assignees. If passed at all, it should, in my judgment, be confined to cases where patents for the lands or the equivalents for patents have not yet issued, leaving to the courts the control of titles after they have once passed from the Government. This office has no power to compel the relinquishment of the outstanding evidences of title; and to authorize the issue of two patents for the same land, except in cases where the clearest legal right demands the issue of the second, only serves to bring contempt upon the decisions and actions of the Government, to cast doubt upon every United States patent, and destroy confidence alike in Government officials and the public records.

While I very much desire that some relief may be granted to the settlers, I cannot recommend the sacrifice of vested rights to accomplish the object. By way of inducement, however, to the railroad companies to yield to the claims of the settlers, this Office has prepared and recommended a bill, (S. No. 606,) which was also offered in the House (No. 2630) and with amendments passed that body on the 4th instant, No. 3162.

This will, if passed by the Senate, give to the great mass of settlers in railroad limits security in their homes by the withdrawal of the railroad companies from the conflict, and the acceptance by them of indemnity for the lands relinquished. Such, at least, is the opinion of this Office; and from documents and other information which I have received I have no doubt that the companies will gladly avail themselves of the opportunicy of thus relieving the settlers along their routes on whom will depend in a great measure the local support and traffic of the roads.

Very respectfully,

W. W. CURTIS,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE,
Chairman of Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will only say, in addition to what I have already submitted to the Senate, that I think it the duty of the Government itself to ascertain, in every case where doubt has arisen, whether the patents issued to the railroad companies are valid patents or not. Therefore I shall support the motion of the Senator from Michigan to refer this bill to the Judiciary Committee, in the hope, and in the belief as well, that that committee can report a bill by which the Attorney-General shall be authorized, and directed, if you please, to proceed against all railroad companies in the name of the United States for the purpose of declaring all patents invalid that have been issued to those companies without authority of law. In that case we secure to the settlers every right that it is possible to secure to them by action upon this subject; we save them every expense; we subject the railway companies to a single suit for the purpose of testing a class of cases; and in every aspect, both as to the attainment of justice and to the comfort to the settlers, it seems to me wiser that the General Government should take the responsibility of ascertaining by information filed by the Attorney-General, or by some other proper process, whether these patents are valid or not. If it shall happen, as I fear it may happen, that these patents are many or all of them valid, we must accept the result, and the fact that settlers have been misled by instructions from the Land Office, or that they have entered upon lands without a proper knowledge of the law, is no answer. If we have granted, or if our predecessors have granted, these lands to railways and patents have been issued, we have to accept the result; and if settlers, through the agency of the officers of the Government or by the action of the law-making power of the Government, have been misled, then it is for Congress to consider what shall be done in regard to them. But if there are valid titles outstanding, of what use is it to issue other evidences of title to other persons for the same tracts of land and precisely in the same form? Does it help anybody to have a right to go into a court and litigate a question when as a matter of fact there is no ground for the litigation? If these titles outstanding are invalid, let that fact be ascertained at the expense of the General Government. If they are valid, let it be ascertained at the expense of the General Government.

Mr. INGALLS. There are now no outstanding titles. The railroad corporations have secured the cancellation of the settlers' patents and refuse to take out patents themselves to avoid taxation.

Mr. BOUTWELL. They must take patents some time or other. They cannot dispose of the land without taking patents.

Mr. INGALLS. We have a bill already pending before the Senate for the purpose of compelling railroad corporations to take out patents in order that their lands may bear the proper share of the public taxation which they have refused to bear.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Just so far as the railway companies have neglected or refused to take patents for lands that are covered by the grants which have been made to them, just so much the stronger will the case of the Government be in a proceeding to oust them from all claim of title. Therefore the case is better than I had supposed it was before the explanation made by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is very easily satisfied.

Mr. SARGENT. It is sometimes worth while to see where a letter comes in that is read before the Senate for its instruction and from what source it emanates. The letter read at the desk a moment ago was not by the Secretary of the Interior now existing nor by any former one, nor by the Commissioner of the General Land Office nor any former one, but it was written by a clerk in the Office who chanced to be Acting Commissioner.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope the honorable Senator from California does not mean to have the Senate understand that that letter is any less the opinion of the Land Office than it would be if signed by the Commissioner. The gentleman who signed the letter signed it in his official capacity, and sat as Commissioner of the General Land Office when he signed it.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; but I do mean to say it has not as much weight in my mind as if it had been signed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator merely means that he has a different opinion of the person who wrote it.

Mr. SARGENT. Not at all.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not object to that, but the remark of the Senator in regard to his right to sign it.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not deny that the act was performed by a person who understood that he had a right to do it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. He was Acting Commissioner by the operation of law.

Mr. SARGENT. But I do say that the Secretary of the Interior is selected for particular duties for which he has a supposed fitness. He is supposed to have a certain grade of ability. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, who is to grasp great questions and make semi-judicial decisions, is also selected with some view to his fitness for that place; but these duties are not to be assumed by a mere clerk in the Office, who in a comparatively few instances when the Commissioner is absent fills that office. In other words, I do not think it is a very creditable authority; but even conceding that it is, that the source from which it emanates is of the highest character, I must say I never read a document so confused in terms and so difficult to understand as the one which has been read at the desk and which I now hold in my hand. I supposed that from it I should get some light on this second section of the bill which particularly interests me and for which I have spoken so earnestly. I wanted a precedent to be laid down by this second section of the bill by which when a pre-emption claim within the limits of a railroad grant, valid and existing at the time of the grant, was abandoned, then the land should not go to the railroad company, but should be still held at the disposition of the Government of the United States, or, in other words, should go to its pre-emptioners who would pay for it, or to its homesteaders who would make a home there. That, I supposed, would be a reform which we were going to work. But this gentleman says:

The second section can have no application, for the reason that no necessity exists for the confirmation of entries permitted upon lands excepted from the grant by valid claims existing at date of definite location.

If any Senator here is lawyer enough to parse that sentence and explain it, I would like to have him do so. I cannot extract any meaning from it. He goes on:

And if the withdrawal was subsequent to location of the road, a claim valid at the date of withdrawal must have been also valid at the prior date, and entries made upon lands in that condition are approved as a matter of course under the present laws.

If any meaning can be extracted from the two parts of the sentence taken together, it is that, if there was any valid pre-emption claim at the time of the grant which never was abandoned, a patent issued upon it. It did not need the Acting Commissioner of the Land Office to tell us that; but what are you going to do with the case of just such a claimant to the land where the land was reserved and that claim became extinguished and you want to prevent it from going to the railroad company? Says this wise gentleman, "There is no necessity for the section in that view of the case!"

Mr. INGALLS. He was writing an argument for the railroad corporations.

Mr. SARGENT. That is what he was doing, as the Senator suggests, making an argument for railroad corporations. Here we want positive legislation, in my judgment, effectually to prevent this land from falling into the hands of the railroad companies, so that they cannot come in as a general legatee to all the lands in the United States and take those reserved from the operation of their grant.

If the withdrawal was prior to the definite location, and the claim was abandoned prior to such location, the Department has not ruled that subsequent entries should be allowed—

And this section does not require it either—

And if in any case such entry has been permitted, it has been in violation of the rules and clearly erroneous.

Unquestionably. But what are you going to do with the new principle we try to lay down in the shape of affirmative legislation, that the subsequent settler going upon land which did not pass to the railroad company by the express terms of the original grant shall not be disturbed? Is it to go to the railroad company? We say by this section the subsequent settler shall be recognized, and it interferes with nobody's vested right. I say this letter contains "words without knowledge;" it throws no light upon the subject at all. It is not such a document, I believe, as would be written by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior provided the subject had been submitted to either of them.

Mr. HARVEY. I simply wish to state that the letter which the Senator from Massachusetts has read was before the Committee on Public Lands when this matter was first considered nearly two years ago, in May, 1874, and that it there received, as I think, proper consideration. I think it a very unfortunate letter to be quoted by one taking the view that the Senator from Massachusetts does on this question. In this letter the writer says:

I cannot recommend the destruction of legal titles for the purpose of recognizing mere equitable rights founded upon misconstruction of law and originating in mistakes of either Department or legislative officers.

That amounts to but little less than a charge upon the legislative department of the Government of responsibility for the wrongs which these settlers suffer. If the view now taken of the matter by the Department be correct, I must say that I think a heavy responsibility rests upon the legislative branch for these wrongs. It follows as a logical consequence, if the grounds of the rulings be conceded. To show the theory of this letter I will read the last two paragraphs. The writer says:

While I very much desire that some relief may be granted to the settlers, I cannot recommend the sacrifice of vested rights to accomplish the object. By way of inducement, however, to the railroad companies to yield to the claims of the settlers, this office has prepared and recommended a bill, Senate No. 606, which was also offered in the House, (No. 2630,) and with amendments passed that body on the 4th instant, No. 3162.

I will state as a matter of fact that that bill also passed the Senate. So, as you have seen, the right of one of the parties has been recognized, and at the instigation of the Land Department. He proceeds:

This will, if passed by the Senate, give to the great mass of settlers in railroad limits security in their homes.

How? By the vindication of the law and the issuance of patents to those who have strictly complied with the law? By any correction of the wrongs resulting from these rulings of the Department? No. He says:

By the withdrawal of the railroad companies from the conflict, and the acceptance by them of indemnity for the lands relinquished. Such, at least, is the opinion of this Office; and from documents and other information which I have received I have no doubt that the companies will gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of thus relieving the settlers along their routes on whom will depend in a great measure the local support and traffic of the roads.

Now, Mr. President, this is not a question to be determined by such considerations. It is a question of right, and it is a duty that devolves on this Senate to see that the rights of the people under the laws passed by the Senate and House of Representatives are vindicated. If this bill fails it will certainly give a great deal of significance to the remarks made a while ago by the Senator from California.

I certainly hope that this bill will not be referred to any committee, but will receive the final action of the Senate before any other disposition is made of it. I certainly hope that we may be able to reach a vote on it this evening and determine the question.

Mr. BOGY. I will not at this late hour of the session undertake to discuss the merits of this bill; I rise to avoid a misconception of my position. I am not opposed to the measures embraced in the bill. My opposition has been to some of the terms of the bill as framed. The measure itself meets my entire approbation, so much so that I am ready and willing to vote for the bill as it is because the friends of the measure on this floor, the committee who have reported the bill, are in favor of it as it is. My objection to the bill was that it did not go quite far enough, and in some portions of it was too loosely worded. But I am opposed to the reference of the measure to the Committee on the Judiciary, or indeed to any committee whatever, but particularly to the Committee on the Judiciary. I know the members of that committee are good lawyers, but there are good lawyers also upon the Committee on Public Lands, and I believe the lawyers upon the Committee on Public Lands investigate a subject of this sort with more care and attention than the men who are members of the Committee on the Judiciary. Therefore I will oppose that reference, and hope it will not be made; but if a further reference be made at all, it should go back to the same committee from which it came—the Committee on Public Lands.

We have lost sight in the discussion of this measure of the real objects desired to be accomplished. The Senator from California in his argument seems to throw out the idea that those persons who, like myself, have opposed the bill because it was not as we thought properly drawn are here under the influence of the great railroad monopolies and have no sympathy with the pre-emptors and the homesteaders of the West. Now, as far as I am concerned, a speech of that kind is entirely unnecessary. My sympathy with the class of western settlers is not new-born; it was not born yesterday or the day before. It is as old as my life and has grown with my growth, and it is sincere; and no reflection that the Senator may cast on me and others——

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator did not understand me, I trust, as making a reflection on him. I understood the Senator to be advocating the principles of the bill. I intended to reflect on no one, and certainly not on a Senator who I understood was friendly to the bill and wanted to make it more stringent.

Mr. BOGY. I am friendly to the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I so understood.

Mr. BOGY. My object was to perfect the bill. My object was to make it so perfect that litigation would hereafter be avoided. I know very well that litigation may take place between the poor people who have made these pre-emptions in the remote West and these large rich monopolies very much to the disadvantage of the pre-emptor and the homesteader. Knowing that, I was anxious to perfect a bill here which would avoid litigation, if possible.

Now, sir, I hope that the friends of the measure will vote against the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and against its reference to any other committee whatsoever. If the friends of the bill are satisfied with it, if the committee to whom the subject was referred are satisfied with it, I am willing to take it. I see no harm to the Government, no harm to the public. Nobody can be injured by it but those persons whom you want to benefit, and they can only be injured to the extent that we do not do them as much good as I think we are able to do them. That is all; but as far as the bill goes, imperfect though it is, the imperfections are not of a character to induce anybody friendly to the measure to vote against it. As far as it goes it is all right; it does not go quite far enough, that is all.

Now I hope the reference will not take place, and that the bill will actually be passed, and passed to-day. The subject has been discussed enough.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator from Nebraska give way, that we may have an executive session?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make no objection.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BOGY. Let us pass this bill to-day. I hope the motion will be withdrawn. I think no one is disposed to discuss the bill further. It has been debated two days.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think we cannot get through with it to-day. It is a very important bill.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 17.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am glad to see the Senate so industriously inclined now, and I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to say, Mr. President, that I wish this bill to come to a decisive vote to-day if possible. A bill of this character has been before the Senate, I think, for the last three or four years. It has received the favorable action of the Committee on Public Lands in at least two Congresses since I have had the honor to be a member of this body.

While I am not sufficiently versed in the law to elaborate or perhaps to appreciate some of the fine-spun theories in regard to vested rights, which have been discussed at such length on this floor, yet, looking at the matter in the light of common sense and common honesty, it does seem to me that a settler or a person who proposes to become a settler upon public lands, who proceeds to a regular United States land office, and there, upon consultation with the regularly appointed officer of the General Government, and upon an examination with him of the official plats and records of public lands, selects for himself a tract of land upon which and to which) so far as the records of the Government show and so far as he has or can possibly have any information) no other person or no corporation has any equitable or legal title, I say, sir, that it does seem to me that that man who, after having performed that action, in good faith settles upon that tract of land, and spends his little all in building upon that tract of land a home for himself and children, has at least a just right, if not, as it is termed by the lawyers, a vested right. I think, sir, that he has a right which this country ought to protect him in.

As I said before, I am not able to discuss the legal bearings of this bill so far as to proclaim that any action which we may take will be effective in giving him that right; but there are some principles which we all know to be just which we do not require the decision of a court to tell us are just; and I am ready for one, so far as my vote goes, to say that neither this Congress nor any future Congress nor any past Congress ever intended or does intend to pass a law which shall require a settler upon the public lands to settle upon those lands at his own peril because he is not cognizant of a fact which he could not possibly know. It is impossible that he should know when the legal right of a railroad company accrues, if that right does accrue upon the vote of some board of directors a thousand miles off from the land. We know the method of obtaining the title to their lands is the same over this country. We go to the records and search before we buy lands from private persons. If there is nothing on those records to show that any one else has an adverse title, we buy and buy freely. Why should this Government require any other information to be obtained by a settler on the public lands? Why ought not at least the records of the local land office of the district where the lands are situated be sufficient to give him all the information that he ought to require?

I hope this bill will pass, and pass to-day, and pass without further reference and further delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the first section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the title which the State of Wisconsin or its assigns may have to lands granted to that State by the act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856, and the acts amendatory thereof, but such title shall remain as valid as the same now is.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. HOWE. If there is any objection taken to the form of this amendment, I should like to have some other form suggested. If it is really the purpose of the Senate to clothe the Commissioner of the General Land Office with the authority to divest the State of that grant, I should like to know it. The Senator from California suggested a different form of amendment which would be satisfactory to him.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator accepts my form of amendment, I will certainly favor it. I think the construction that he fears should be excluded; but I object to his amendment on what I think to be a substantial ground, that we should have to go on then and except the next State and then the next State, and so on through the list, and even railroad companies by name, and except them all until, as I said before, we re-enacted the statutes in the shape of an exception. I was perfectly willing to provide, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, that hereafter the Commissioner of the General Land Office should not declare such lands forfeited without authority of Congress. I think that is right, because I do not believe he possesses the power, or rather I must speak under correction of the Supreme Court. Without the decision of the Supreme Court I should have thought it well that he should exercise that power; but as they have so said and we have never by express statute conferred it upon him, I am willing to require that hereafter it shall be conferred on him before he acts. In other words, I understand the cases to have passed and to be few in number where the Commissioner supposed the lands were restored to the public domain, and the settlers then went on them in good faith, improved them, paid their money for them, and were subsequently cut out by the extension of the grants by Congress. I am willing to say that hereafter he shall not make such declarations without authority of Congress, and I commend it to the friends of the bill. Of course they cannot doubt after the earnest fight I have made for it these two days that I speak in the interest of the bill and the objects it proposes. I think the purpose is just, but I do object to the original form of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin for the reason I have stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall follow those who have charge of this bill, but I am opposed to the acceptance of the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin. He wants to reserve to Wisconsin for all time to come the benefits of a grant of land which was made in 1856. For twenty years the grant has been in existence and the grantees have not completed the road. The time is out long since. There is no reason in the world why the Government of the United States ought not to assume the possession of those lands. In every case where railroad companies have failed to do what they agreed to do as an express condition of the grant of land, I think the Government of the United States through the executive authority should take possession of that land and sell it under the general land laws.

Why should Wisconsin hold a great body of land in her own State when she has failed to comply with the terms on which the grant was made? It seems to me unjust. I would go a little further, and I would assert the power of the Government at once in such cases to order the lands to be sold. I do not want to interfere with the local affairs of my friend from Wisconsin, nor do I agree with him that his construction is correct. Merely because we say that where the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the general authority of law, after proclamation by the President, has put on the market again public lands in such cases, and titles have accrued in favor of homestead settlers, patents shall issue to the settlers, that does not imply that the Commissioner of the General Land Office can restore those lands without all the preliminaries required by law: proclamation of the President, the formal action of the authorities, &c. To restore lands once withdrawn from market there must be the authority of the President of the United States, the head of the Interior Department, and also the formal act of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I do not think the inference is at all to be drawn from the language of the bill now that hereafter the Commissioner of the General Land Office can restore these lands to market without the authority of the Secretary of the Interior and the President of the United States. Therefore I do not believe either in the object he desires to accomplish or in the construction the Senator puts on the bill. Still I do not pretend to interfere with the management of this bill. I intend to vote for it as an act of justice in the past, if nothing more can be secured in the future; but I would rather have it broad, so that whenever a railroad company that receives a grant of land does not comply with the terms and conditions of the grant, when there is plainly and palpably a failure on their part, the land shall at once revert to the Government. In such cases there is no rule in justice or law or equity that ought to prevent the United States from taking possession of the lands, renewing the grant if they choose or allowing the lands to be open to homestead and pre-emption.

Mr. HARVEY. As the purpose of this bill is simply the vindication of rights of certain settlers who have suffered by a misconstruction of the law, I do not think it ought to be complicated with other legislation. I hope the Senate will pass the bill without loading it with amendments on other questions but remotely, if at all, connected with the pending bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the amendment offered is liable to the objections urged by the Senator from Ohio, and I think further that the object of the Senator from Wisconsin may be fully accomplished by a more simple amendment of the bill, and I would suggest to the Senator that ,if this amendment should not be carried, the bill could be amended by striking out in lines 10 and 11 of the first section the words "by order of the General Land Office," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "according to law." That would avoid all the difficulty.

Mr. INGALLS. The language to which the Senator from Minnesota has referred was deliberately inserted for the purpose of meeting the class of cases to which this bill particularly applies; and to adopt the amendment suggested by him would, in my judgment, be to very nearly entirely destroy the beneficial effects of the bill, because certain lands have heretofore been restored to market by order of the General Land Office; and to strike out the words "by order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office" would leave the question open as a matter of construction.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I differ from the Senator from Ohio as to the propriety of the object at which I aimed in my amendment, and differ from him as to the necessity of it. How that object shall be attained, whether by the amendment I proposed, or the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, or that suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, is a matter of comparative indifference to me. I think the amendment I suggested myself is plain and specific, applies to a particular State and a particular case, and is subject to no possible misconstruction. I think the amendment of the Senator from California, however, would be adequate for the purpose I have in view, and so, I think, I may say of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Minnesota. But that end at which I aim ought to be conceded by the Senate and ought to be conceded by the Senator from Ohio. When you make a grant to a State upon a condition which the State defies, which the State ignores, which the State utterly refuses to comply with, undoubtedly the condition should be enforced and the right of the State should be divested. The case to which I refer is not a case of that kind. True, you made this grant a good while ago. The State has not deliberately and obstinately refused to comply with the conditions. The State has been diligently endeavoring to comply with the conditions and has very largely complied with them.

Mr. INGALLS. Have the lands been restored to market by order of the General Land Office?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir, by no order whatever; but they will be within sixty days after this bill with these lines in, or I fear they may be. The State has built—my colleague perhaps can state more correctly than myself the number of miles, but it cannot be less than two hundred miles.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Nearer three hundred miles.

Mr. HOWE. Nearer three hundred miles, my colleague says, and the grant is in his part of the State.

Mr. INGALLS. Are there any adverse pre-emption claims within the limits of the land grant?

Mr. HOWE. None that I know of.

Mr. BOGY. Is it the Saint Croix grant?

Mr. HOWE. The Saint Croix grant.

Mr. INGALLS. If the lands are not restored and no order of restoration has been made and there are no conflicting claims, does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to burden this bill with amendments which have no special pertinence to matters already in issue or controversy?

Mr. HOWE. Because you put into this bill an authority to the Commissioner to restore them to market. You say you do not mean to do it. I ask you to say so in the bill in any form you choose.

Mr. INGALLS. We neither say it nor deny it.

Mr. HOWE. But you do say it. There is the authority. I do not know that it was drawn with that purpose; but the declaration of the Senator from Ohio leads me to suppose that it may have been.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator intend to have the Senate believe that his opinion is that those words are a direct grant of power or authority to the officers named to restore the lands to market without other intervention by other officers?

Mr. HOWE. If I was at liberty to choose the form in which I would express my opinion, I should rather say that it was an indirect grant of power than a direct one, but that it will hold as a grant of power I give as my opinion very unequivocally, and it will be exerted in that direction.

Here is a State which has been struggling from the time that you made this grant to this time to comply with the conditions; struggling in good faith. You remember that the year 1856, when this grant was made, was followed by the year 1857, and you know that that was a year of general adversity and prostration of business and financial credit. Railroads were not constructed anywhere to any great extent. We did nothing in the way of constructing railways in the State of Wisconsin. We were as prostrate as other States. After the war commenced and prosperity began to return to the country Congress directly interfered, with full notice of the fact, to embarrass the State of Wisconsin in the construction of this road, and you did it simply by granting to the State of Minnesota a tract of land to aid in building a railroad from Saint Paul to the same terminus on Lake Superior. Minnesota had the advantage of Wisconsin, because that road started from a point with which there was water communication. We could not go on with our road from Hudson, only eighteen miles from Saint Paul, until the road was built from the south, from Madison to Hudson. That has been completed, and the road is now progressing beyond Hudson; but because there was water communication with Saint Paul, Minnesota was enabled to go on with the construction of her road and did go on with it. That road has been built, and the owners of that road have been in Congress and in the money markets of the world from that time to this trying to defeat the execution of the grant made to the State of Wisconsin. This has embarrassed the State very seriously. It has not defeated the enterprise altogether. In spite of this opposition the State has struggled along, has built more or less road nearly every year, built I think some twenty miles last year and is still going on.

There is another hardship in this matter. The road already constructed under this grant has been constructed on the southern end of the line through a country along which there was but little public land at the time the grant was made, and therefore the State has derived but very little advantage from the grant. The line yet to be constructed from a point north of Hudson to Lake Superior runs through a body of public land; and to strip the State of the grant of that portion of the line after she has struggled against such adverse circumstances to execute every one of the conditions of the grant and fails only in point of time is a case of hardship which I never knew inflicted on a State, and which I cannot believe the Senate of the United States really means to inflict on the State of Wisconsin. The Senator from California admits that that will not be just. The Senator from Kansas objects that it is not pertinent to this bill. It is pertinent to this bill, because it excludes a hostile construction sure to be put upon the bill. It cannot hurt your bill. It is in the Senate; if you do not mean to do this thing, say you do not mean it. It does not embarrass your bill at all; but if you mean to do this thing, just give the State of Wisconsin notice.

I shall have to insist upon dividing the Senate upon my own amendment unless somebody will submit an amendment which is more satisfactory to those who advertise themselves as the friends of the bill and who are accepted as the friends of the bill. I will take either the amendment suggested by the Senator from Minnesota or that by the Senator from California. I should like to know whether Senators will consent to either.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota would certainly be open to the question what had and what had not been in accordance with law.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment moved by the Senator from California is not subject to that difficulty.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one word upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I have had no time to examine the phraseology. It may or may not reach beyond what he claims; but my experience is that where there is a claim or a pretense of claim that a railroad grant has lapsed, or where the friends of a grant are perhaps fearful that some construction may be given unfavorable to the grant to the State, from time to time amendments are offered to a bill apparently harmless, that when you come to look at them have a bearing far beyond what was contemplated or perhaps intended. Of course I say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I know he sincerely wishes to accomplish the object he has suggested, but I have a very great fear that it may be found hereafter that the amendment he here proposes to this bill, apparently harmless, may by the construction of the courts or by the construction of the Departments give to the State rights beyond any right that we propose to give, and perhaps have the effect of continuing that grant, when in fact it has lapsed, when in fact we desire that it shall lapse.

I have had much experience in these matters, and I have seen amendments come in apparently harmless and that seem to be directly in the line of what all desire, and yet afterward when courts or Departments came to get hold of them they find that they have a meaning entirely different from what was contemplated, and do a harm beyond what any person would desire. I object to this amendment for that reason. I have had no time to examine it. I cannot see the exact bearing of it. I know there is a grant in that State. I know that the time has passed. I know the question is raised as to whether there can be a forfeiture by the mere act of the officer of the Government in restoring those lands to market, and the professed object of this amendment is to so arrange as that there shall be no loss, whereas the fear I have is that it will be found when you come to construe the amendment hereafter it may have the effect of keeping alive something we do not want to do. I am sure the Senator does not desire that; I am sure he does not want to have the law any otherwise than it is; but my fear is that it may have that effect, and therefore I shall oppose it.

Mr. HOWE. I want the Senator from Iowa to have an opportunity to look at that amendment, to look at the amendment suggested by the Senator from California, and to consider with himself whether he will consent to allow this bill to pass in some form so that it shall not strip the State of Wisconsin of that grant; and therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question, the Chair will lay before the Senate some House bills.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 1340) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions and bounty lands was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. No. 1564) to increase pensions in certain cases was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOWE. I withdraw that motion and move an executive session. It is necessary to have an executive session, I understand.

The question being put, there were on division—ayes 26, noes 21.

Mr. SARGENT asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (who had at first voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] on the measure that the friends of the bill seem anxious to pass to-night. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HAMLIN, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I forgot that I was paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] on all questions connected with the bill, and I therefore ask leave to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BOUTWELL, (who had at first voted in the affirmative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] and I presume it extends to this vote.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, English, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Johnston, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Stevenson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Dennis, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, Logan, McMillan, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Sargent, Spencer, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Christiancy, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Jones of Florida, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, and West—19.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened and (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BEEBE. I find in the record of the proceedings of Monday last upon a resolution introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. WHITTHORNE] that I am recorded as voting against his motion to suspend the rules. I was not in my seat at the time, and of course did not vote at all. Had I been here I should have voted with the gentleman in favor of his proposition. I desire to have the correction made in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

CENTENNIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to correct a misprint in the centennial appropriation bill. In the preamble the title of an act is recited as having been passed in 1875 when it was passed in 1871. I would like to have that correction made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the correction had better be made in the Senate.

Mr. PARSONS. I ask the privilege of making a statement in reference to the final vote of the House yesterday upon the centennial appropriation bill. My name is recorded as not voting upon the final call of the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill. I was present at the time the test question was made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in Committee of the Whole, by his motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and I voted in favor of that motion. But by a sudden attack of illness I was prevented from being present at the time the bill was put upon its final passage. Had I been present I should have voted against the passage of the bill.

RICE M. BROWN.

Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R No. 1568) for the relief of Rice M. Brown; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STATING ACCOUNTS OF DEFAULTING OFFICERS.

Mr. HUNTER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1569) empowering the accounting officers of the Treasury to state accounts against officers of the United States who are in default, and by reason of which default the moneys of the United States have become unavailable, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES ROBERTS AND OTHERS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1570) for the relief of James Roberts, Noah Roberts, and the heirs of John Roberts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM S. MASSIE.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1571) to pay William S. Massie $289 as a soldier in the late war, and to place his name on the pension-roll; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB MEETZE.

Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1572) granting a pension to Jacob Meetze, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

COLORED SCHOOLS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1573) to amend an act approved March 3, 1873, relative to the colored schools of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL ENGINEERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1574) to provide for the repeal of all laws authorizing the appointment of civil engineers in the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM PALMER.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1575) granting a pension to William Palmer, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY.

Mr. CHITTENDEN, by unanimous consent, presented the following petition; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Whereas in 1860 this nation, composed of 31,500,000 population, required but $208,000,000 in currency, or about $6.60 per capita, with a much less extended credit system than we now have, to supply the demands of the people and trade; and whereas while the population has only increased about 8,000,000, our currency circulation has increased about five hundred and sixty millions, or to the enormous sum of $767,500,000, of which $372,000,000 is national Treasury notes; and whereas the credit of said national currency is 13 per cent. below par in gold; and whereas this country is pledged to raise the credit of her currency to a gold basis at the earliest practicable day, and as we believe the business of the country can only be honestly and permanently revived by a restoration of confidence in the Government's determination to carry out the obligation under which the currency was issued; and whereas we believe the same process by which the credit of our bonds has been advanced above par our national notes may also be raised to par, it being a simple business transaction which any honest business man would adopt who had notes under protest; if he had the security on which he could borrow money to pay his notes he would certainly do so, and redeem his credit. Now therefore, we the undersigned, citizens of Schenectady, do hereby respectfully petition to your honorable body to pass the bill presented by Hon. Mr. CHITTENDEN, of New York, (with perhaps the slight amendment giving the Secretary discretionary power as to monthly amount to be redeemed, say not to exceed $3,000,000 per month, also as to rate of interest to be paid, say not to exceed 4½ per cent.,) which bill is now in the hands of your honorable Committee on Banking and Currency, and your petitioners will ever pray.

Signed by three hundred and thirty-five persons.

J. M. WAIDE.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1576) for the relief of J. M. Waide, of Denton County, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH R. PARKER.

Mr. THROCKMORTON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Joseph R. Parker, of Dallas County, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. SEEDS.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1578) for the relief of James M. Seeds; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CATHERINE GREEN M'KOWN.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1579) granting a pension to Catherine Green McKown; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ALMON P. GRAVES.

Mr. BLAIR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1580) granting a pension to Almon P. Graves; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN GOWERS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1581) for the relief of John Gowers, late of Company C, One hundred and eleventh Regiment New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HUGO HILLEBRANDT.

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1582) granting arrears of pension to Hugo Hillebrandt, late major Thirty-ninth New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY M. OLIVER.

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1583) granting a pension to Henry M. Oliver, of Auburn, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS BEFORE DISTRICT BOARD OF AUDIT.

Mr. CATE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1584) to extend the time within which certain claims may be presented to the board of audit of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

COLLECTORS AND SUPERVISORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1585) to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to designate and fix the points at which collectors and supervisors of the revenue shall hold their offices; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HARRIET BOWMAN.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1586) granting a pension to Harriet Bowman, of Logan County, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD LEE.

Mr. STEVENSON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1587) granting a pension to Edward Lee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JEFFERSON BOWERS.

Mr. STEVENSON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1588) granting an additional pension to Jefferson Bowers, of Mason County, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at twelve o'clock and twenty-seven minutes; and the committees will be called for business of a public nature.

THIRD-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to call up at this time the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill fixing the rate of postage on third-class mail matter was recommitted?

The SPEAKER. That will be in order after the call of committees is completed.

PROSECUTION OF CLAIMS AND PATENTS.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1589) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask that this bill be now put on its passage.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes so as to provide that it shall not be lawful for any person holding office, after the passage of this act, as an officer, clerk, or employé in any of the Departments or Bureaus of the Government, to act as counsel, attorney, or agent, or be interested directly or indirectly in any firm established for prosecuting either claims or patents, applications for which were pending in any of said Departments or Bureaus while he was such officer, clerk, or employé, or at any time prior thereto, nor in any manner nor by any means, directly or indirectly, to aid in the prosecution of any such claims or patents within two years next after he shall have ceased to be such officer, clerk, or employé.

The bill further provides in the second section that any person in the service of the United States violating the provisions of this act by recognizing any such officer, clerk, or employé in an application for a patent or prosecuting a claim against the United States as counsel, attorney, or agent shall be ipso facto discharged from the service of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Is this bill printed?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir.

Mr. FORT. I submit that we ought not to act on a bill of this importance without its being printed.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I wish to say that I think the purpose and scope of this bill are right; but it is a measure of some importance, and unless it is in print, I hope it may be permitted to lie over one day.

Mr. FORT. I move that the bill be recommitted and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] ask the previous question on the bill?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir; I do not insist upon immediate action on the bill, if gentlemen desire that it may be printed.

Mr. SAMPSON. I wish to make one suggestion. This bill has been printed; and in the form in which it is now presented there are only one or two slight modifications. Is it necessary that the bill should be reprinted?

Mr. FRYE. A measure which includes the greater portion of this bill as well as much outside of it is now before the Judiciary Committee; it has been referred to me as a subcommittee, and I am now considering it. I hope, therefore, that the bill will be referred to our committee.

Mr. FORT. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. This has been regularly referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. FORT. We were informed that the bill was not printed.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois is that the bill as reported by him from the Committee on Patents be printed and recommitted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. That will answer the purpose.

The bill was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

ASSIGNMENT OF PATENTS.

Mr. HARTZELL, from the Committee on Patents, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 917) to amend section 4898 of the Revised Statutes in relation to patents with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that section 4898 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

SECTION 4898. Every patent, or any interest therein, shall be assignable in law by an instrument in writing, which shall be acknowledged before some officer authorized to take the acknowledgment of deeds where such instrument is executed, and which assignment shall take effect from and after the date of record in the Patent-Office; and the patentee or his assigns or legal representatives may in like manner grant and convey an exclusive right under his patent to the whole or any specified part of the United States. No assignment, grant, or conveyance of any patent shall be entered of record which contains matter irrelevant or foreign to the subject-matter of the assignment, grant, or conveyance.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EXPENDITURES IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BEEBE. I am directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department to report the following resolution for the adoption of the House at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk at a salary not to exceed $5 per day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think this resolution is in order as a report from this committee. It ought to come from the Committee on Accounts, and I hope the resolution will be referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. It comes from the committee which desires the services of the clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it is not such a report as I think that committee has the right to make. The gentleman now reports the resolution for the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that this resolution should pass without reference to the Committee on Accounts; but as the House has already set the precedent of passing such resolutions without reference to the appropriate committee—the Committee on Accounts—I will not make the point of order on my friend from New York.

Mr. BEEBE. The Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department is not particular whether this resolution is immediately adopted or referred to the Committee on Accounts to be reported back from that committee; but the committee do desire that some action shall be taken as soon as possible. If anything is expected to be done by that committee, it must have the facilities for doing it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman consent to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Accounts with instruction to make an early report?

Mr. BEEBE. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution is so referred.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to make the following report and ask for its adoption at this time:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the clerk heretofore assigned to the Committee on Private Land Claims and the Committee on Education and Labor be assigned to the Committee on Private Land Claims and the Committee on Public Expenditures; and that the Committee on Education and Labor and the Special Committee on the Mexican Border Troubles be allowed to appoint one clerk jointly.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I am directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to report the following resolution, and to ask for its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be allowed a clerk at a salary to be fixed by the Committee on Accounts

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. CAULFIELD. No, sir; I desire the adoption of the resolution at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Accounts, and make the motion that it be so referred.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice are already at work; they are receiving communications from all parts of the country, but it is impossible to prosecute our labors successfully without we are at once authorized to employ a clerk. The Committee on Accounts may not meet for some time. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have already made the motion to refer to the Committee on Accounts, and I hope that motion will be adopted.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to amend the resolution by adding a provision that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be also allowed to employ a clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that motion. The resolution is reported from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and besides the gentleman from Illinois has demanded the previous question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If my amendment is in order I should like to move it at this time.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this time.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

POSTAGE ON THIRD-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1042) fixing the rate of postage on third-class mail matter was recommitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether he proposes to limit the debate on this bill?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will say that I would like to comply with whatever is the pleasure of the House in that regard. The members of the committee have no desire, except with a view to the expedition of business, to limit the debate; and if the members of the House desire to discuss the matter, I have no objection to an arrangement under which I shall call the previous question at four o'clock, or sooner if the debate does not continue so long.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire that the Chair shall take the sense of the House on that proposition?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri suggests that general debate upon this bill be closed at four o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. Or sooner.

The SPEAKER. Or sooner. Is there objection to that arrangement?

Mr. RANDALL. My reason for saying "or sooner" is that the Committee on Appropriations is ready to call up the Military Academy appropriation bill, but does not want to interfere with the gentleman from Missouri until the debate on his bill is exhausted.

Mr. CONGER. Is it a printed bill?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. It is. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have no desire to discuss the matter for the length of time indicated, as we are ourselves perfectly satisfied in regard to it. I merely suggested a fixing of time for debate for the convenience of members of the House who may desire to speak to the question.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair hear objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to object.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Is the proposition to limit general debate?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire that all debate shall close at four o'clock?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Yes, sir; all debate.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I think the proposition should not be so broad as to limit the debate on amendments. Let it be a motion to limit general debate, and the committee can then proceed to discuss amendments under the five-minute rule. It is not in order to move at this time to limit anything but the general debate, and I hope the gentleman will confine his motion to that. For myself I do not care though the general debate be limited to five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest that general debate be cut off at an earlier hour than has been mentioned, and that then the debates shall run under the five-minute rule for amendments. There is not much to be said of a general nature on the subject of this bill.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Then I shall move that the general debate be limited to one hour.

Mr. HOSKINS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that we proceed to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that all general debate be ended at the close of one hour, after which amendments may be proceeded with in the House under the five-minute rule as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I consent to that, and ask that the House accede to that arrangement.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all mailable matter of the third class referred to in sections 3878 and 3911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States may weigh not exceeding four pounds for each package thereof, and postage shall be charged thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof; that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed. But nothing herein contained shall be held to change or amend section 3879 of said Revised Statutes.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. In explanation of the bill now before the House, as reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, since there seems to be some want of understanding on the part of the House in regard to its features, I will say that it repeals the law that was passed last session, in its last hours, by an amendment of the Senate inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill, increasing the postage on third-class matter from one cent per two ounces of such matter to one cent per ounce, or increasing it from eight cents per pound to sixteen cents per pound. The law was so changed, as I have said, at the last session of Congress, in the last hours of the session, by an amendment inserted obscurely in the sundry civil appropriation bill, with the evident intention of misleading the House, or with the intention that the House should overlook it when it came up for a vote here. The universal voice of the country demands the repeal of that law, and that the postage be restored to what it was before that law was passed, one cent per two ounces or eight cents per pound.

I do not desire now to discuss the features of this bill until I hear what may be said by other members of the House. I will merely add that a provision of law to entitle the soldiers of the United States to receive only two pounds of third-class matter through the mails has been construed by the Postmaster-General as not having been repealed by the law permitting all persons to send through the mails packages of four pounds of third-class matter. This bill repeals also that provision of law, so as to give the soldier as well as the citizen the right to pass through the mails four pounds of third-class matter or merchandise.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] my colleague on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. How much time does my colleague want?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Twenty or twenty-five minutes.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I yield my colleague twenty minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for reducing the postage on all third-class matter from one cent an ounce to one cent for two ounces, or, in other words, to make the postage just one-half what it now is and the same it was prior to the 4th of March last, and the practical questions to look at is whether the Department can carry third-class matter at the price proposed without loss.

I believe members generally agree that all of third-class matter except merchandise, especially transient papers, pamphlets, magazines, posters, unsealed circulars, &c., shall have the postage reduced as the bill provides, and that the disagreement, so far as any may exist, is as to whether some reduction of postage shall be made as to merchandise in packages not exceeding four pounds in weight.

I maintain and think I can satisfy members that all mailable matter of the third class, including merchandise at the rate proposed by this bill, can be carried at a very considerable profit to the Government and not at a loss, as some gentlemen contend. It has been ascertained by the Department that third-class matter would in fact yield postage at the rate of about twelve cents a pound or $240 a ton. When the rate is as proposed by this bill it would be $160 a ton if all packages were even ounces in weight; but not being of even ounces in weight, each fraction of weight over even ounces is charged postage the same as two ounces, and in the aggregate, as before stated, yields postage, say, at the rate of $240 a ton.

Having called attention to the amount of postage this class of matter will yield at the proposed rate, let us inquire how much the expenses of the Post-Office Department will be increased by carrying the same. It will be admitted by all that the Post-Office Department must be maintained for the purpose of carrying the first and second-class mail matter, that is, letters and newspapers and periodicals, to regular subscribers, and that the rate of postage should not be increased upon the same. So the practical question is, what is the additional cost of carrying third-class matter?

The items of cost of maintaining the Department may be divided into three general heads: First, the amount necessary to pay the salaries of employés of the Department, including postmasters; second, the amount paid for transportation of mails; third, the amount paid for incidentals, such as stationery, stamps, &c.

As to the first of these items, the Postmaster-General's report made to this Congress shows that at the close of the last fiscal year there were 384 departmental officers and employés, 35,547 postmasters, 4,467 clerks in post-offices, 2,195 letter-carriers, 987 route agents, 901 railway post-office clerks and other employés; making the aggregate number of employés, exclusive of contractors for carrying the mails, 44,897 persons. The aggregate pay of these employés, including all other expenditures of the Department proper to be counted for the last fiscal year, and excluding payments to contractors for carrying the mails, was $16,819,620; more than one-half of the total expenditures of the Department.

Now I want to call attention specially to the fact that all these post-offices have to be maintained and all this expense incurred for the purpose of carrying letters, newspapers, and periodicals, and this, too, even if all of the third-class matter known as books and packages of merchandise were excluded from the mails; or, to state it in another way, the Government would not have to pay its employés, including postmasters, any more for handling this class of third-class matter than it would if it was entirely excluded from the mails.

Now let us inquire what it costs to have the mails carried, or, to speak more to the precise question, how much additional pay will the railways and other contractors for carrying the mails receive in consequence of this class of matter passing through the mails; and if we can ascertain this amount I am willing to assist in fixing the postage so that the Government will not only be compensated for carrying the same but will make a profit to at least in part compensate for losses that are incurred by carrying newspapers and periodicals to regular subscribers at two and three cents a pound outside of the county where published and free in the county where published.

We find by turning to the Postmaster General's report, page 7, that on the 30th of June, 1875, there were in the service of the Government 6,280 contractors for the transportation of the mails on public routes, exclusive of the railways. The service is divided into railroad routes of the length of 70,083 miles; steamboat routes, length 15,788 miles; other routes, by stage, hack, and horse, &c., and upon which mails are to be carried with celerity, certainty, and security, 192,002 miles in length. Now, then, the compensation on the steamboat and stage, hack, and horse routes, aggregating 207,790 miles in length, is fixed by contract under the law without any reference whatever to the amount of mail carried, the compensation being the same whether there is much or little mail carried each trip over the routes, so that on three-fourths in length of all the mail-routes in operation the pay by the Government is just the same whether this class of matter is carried or not; or, in other words, if we, the Representatives of the people, drive this class of matter from the mails by positive enactment or high postage, and thereby give the express companies a monopoly of carrying the same, the people would be substantially paying twice for the service—once to the contractors for carrying the mails, they not performing the service, and once an exorbitant price to the express companies, they performing the service. But it may be urged that when these contracts to carry the mails expire at the end of four years, in making new contracts the Government will have to pay more on a new contract in consequence of the increase in size of mails from carrying this class of matter. I reply, not so, for it is well known that on this class of routes the principal matter taken into consideration is making the trip over the route, and not the weight of mail carried; and to show that this is so, I call attention that in the year 1874, when the postage on this class of matter was what this bill proposes to make it, these contracts were made, in the aggregate, at a lower rate than they have been for years before. So the only remaining item of cost for carrying this class of matter is the additional pay to railroads.

The price paid railroads for carrying the mails is fixed by law and depends upon the weight of mail carried, as follows, (see section 4002 Revised Statutes:) On routes carrying their whole length per annum an average weight per day of 200 pounds, $50 per mile; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $120; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175; 5,000 pounds, $200; and $25 additional for every 2,000 pounds over 5,000 pounds. Thus it will be seen as the weight of mails increase the pay in proportion decreases, and the fact is, as shown by the Postmaster-General's report, that say one-fourth of the compensation is to railways receiving $50 a mile per annum, and this compensation would not be increased above that amount by carrying packages of merchandise in the mails for the reason that they carry considerably under 200 pounds per mile per annum of mail, while the additional cost of carrying this class of matter upon the great trunk lines of the country is small, for they carry over 5,000 pounds per mile of mail per annum, and for each ton in addition only receive at the rate of $25. And with this explanation I will refer to a statement made by the superintendent of railway mail service in a letter to the Postmaster-General, February 18, 1875, (Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 93,) in which, speaking of the expense of carrying merchandise in the mails so far as transportation is concerned, he says:

> In transportation, a certain system of routes is necessarily maintained. On all stage routes and steamboat lines, weight is not considered, unless it be in a very few and exceptional cases, speed and frequency regulating the cost. The weights on this class of routes could be doubled without material increase of compensation.
> In railroad transportation, fully one-fourth of the annual compensation is to railroads on which the weight could be largely increased without raising their compensation above the minimum; fully one-half is to railroads upon which an increase in weight would increase their compensation at the minimum rate per ton.

And in this connection let me state that the Postmaster-General stated to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads about this matter in reference to the franking privilege, when he was asked if there was any increase of expenses on account of the temporary restoration of the franking privilege up to the 1st day of December last for public documents, that he could not appreciate it; that he had taken two hundred and fifty tons of mail matter from the Capitol and transported it and did not know it. If you think a minute you will see that this is so, when I tell you that the weighings of mails at New York show every day fifty tons of mail matter passing out of the New York post-office alone, consisting in the main of letters and newspapers.

Thus it appears that, instead of fixing a high rate of postage on third-class matter, it would be to the interest of the revenues of the Department to fix the rate so as to carry as much as possible of this class of matter, and that the postage yielded therefrom would be substantially a clear gain without any considerable increase of expense. Still, in light of these facts, gentlemen contend that packages should not be carried in the mails; and one would suppose, to hear some gentlemen talk, that the mails are crammed and overloaded with merchandise. In reply I have to say that I have no reflections to cast on the motives of any post-office official or of any member. Yet I do say that, in my opinion, this whole matter of objection as to packages of merchandise not exceeding four pounds in weight being carried in the mails, or decreasing the postage on the same, comes, in the first instance, from the express companies, and is unwittingly, no doubt, by members urged in their interest and against the common interest of the people and the interest of the Post-Office Department and its revenues; and to show this to be true, I call attention to appendix B of a letter from the superintendent of the railway mail service to the Postmaster-General giving a detailed statement of mail matter of all classes originating at fifty of the largest offices in the United States for a period of four weeks, commencing December 1, 1874, the weighing of the same having been ordered—and remember this was when the postage on third-class matter was just one-half of what it now is—as follows:

Articles.	Pieces.	Weight.
	Number.	Pounds.
Pamphlets, occasional publications, transient newspapers and magazines, hand-bills, posters, and prospectuses ..	4, 884, 467	806, 552
Unsealed circulars	4, 535, 265	83, 700
Total	9, 419, 732	890, 252
Samples of merchandise	225, 733	110, 473
Seeds, cuttings, bulbs, and roots	18, 717	29, 143
Total	234, 450	139, 616

So it will be seen that the express companies care nothing about the postage being reduced on the nine million of pieces of third-class matter, weighing nearly a million pounds. O, no; they generally weigh so little, that whether at large or small postage the Post-Office Department will carry them. So let the Post-Office Department carry them and furnish the multitude of employés necessary to handle them. But as to the other packages, only 234,000 in number, one-fortieth as many as the first-class above mentioned, and weighing in the aggregate one-eighth as much as the nine million of pieces, the postage should be kept up on those according to the logic of some gentlemen.

Why was the old act ever repealed? Why was this postage ever increased? I recollect very well during the first session of the Forty-third Congress when the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reported a bill reducing the postage, we had a very determined fight to pass it. I recollect that subsequently, when it was tacked on an appropriation bill, we had a very determined fight to pass it again. Were any of you gentlemen flooded with letters from your constituents demanding the repeal of this legislation? I guess not; I never was.

Last winter, during the second session of the Forty-third Congress, my committee-room, that of Post-Offices and Post-Roads, was besieged by representatives of express companies asking a hearing upon this question. They said it was a great shame for all this merchandize to be carried in the mails; that the mails were being loaded down with it; and they demanded the repeal of the law or an increase of postage. We sat day after day, I might almost say week after week, listening to them and investigating this matter, and upon a full hearing declined to report a bill to the House repealing or modifying the then existing law in reference to third-class matter.

These special interests, however, never sleep. You may head them off in one place and away off on the other side they dodge up again. You may throw a stone at one of them and hit it square in the forehead and think it is done for; but, with as many lives as a cat, the first thing you know that special interest pops up again here and there. I watched with great interest to see that no amendment was placed on an appropriation bill increasing postage. I was a little new in the House, and did not know much about the ways of legislation. But I supposed when I watched the post-office appropriation bill and the thing was not there I was safe. Greatly to my surprise, however, and I may say greatly to the surprise of everybody else, about two or three weeks after I got home I found that it had been tacked on to the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Now, who had done that? The people who were interested in it, did they demand it? Was it in the interest of the Post-Office Department? Not so, for the Postmaster-General tells you that since the enactment of this law the revenues from third-class matter have absolutely decreased instead of increased. Then there is nobody in the world to be benefited by it except the express companies. They had their agents here; they never slept. They could not get it through by fair, open discussion upon the legislation recommended by a regular committee, and they smuggled it into an appropriation bill, just as ninety-nine one-hundredths of all the bad legislation that is passed is smuggled in.

I rested secure for another reason. I knew that my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, did not believe in carrying merchandise in the mails. But he had made an honorable, square fight and had been beaten upon that proposition in the House during the previous session, and I supposed that it would not be got through upon an appropriation bill without attention being called to it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like about ten minutes more.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Before the gentleman from Illinois resumes I would like to ask him one question. What is the necessity of allowing specimens of metals and ores—mineralogical specimens—to the weight of four pounds to pass through the mails?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will answer that question, if I have time, before I get through. I was saying that greatly to my surprise this amendment got into the sundry civil appropriation bill. There was another reason why I felt secure that it would not get into any of these appropriation bills without attention being called to it, and that was that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] now chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, was my colleague upon the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the Forty-third Congress, and also a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I thought I knew that he favored cheap postage on this class of matter. It always gives me great pleasure to hear that shrill, clear voice of his ringing out in favor of reform and against abuses in legislation. But I listened in vain on that occasion; I did not hear it ring "worth a cent" during the last day of the Forty-third Congress. If you will turn to the RECORD you find that the only gentleman whose voice did ring was that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] when he said, "This is a change of postage in regard to certain kinds of merchandise, and meets the concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations." And the amendment was concurred in; all that Committee on Appropriations, including the gentleman from Pennsylvania, consenting to it. Well, now, the charitable and I think the just conclusion is that in the last two or three hours of the session, with this multitude of amendments, this matter was overlooked. Nevertheless it got in there.

I want to say here and now that I witnessed with sorrow, in the light of the little experience I have had in two sessions in this House the action by which the other day the one hundred and twentieth rule was amended in such a way that almost any kind of legislation can be put upon an appropriation bill in the first instance; and thus the gates are opened wide for all kinds of fraudulent legislation, while a bill is kicked back and forth between the House and the Senate, and by the aid of conference committees in the last hours of the session abuses can creep in to a greater extent than heretofore. I voted against that change of the rule; and it occurred to me that if all the gentlemen on the other side had had my brief experience (not very valuable I admit) that rule would never have been so amended; because heretofore since I have been a member of this House—and I say it without finding fault with anybody—the Committee on Appropriations have substantially controlled the business of the House and the legislation of the country; and that amendment of the one hundred and twentieth rule enables them to monopolize the whole thing.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Will the gentleman allow me ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. It may be very convenient to send these small packages by mail; but why is it not equally convenient to send a package weighing one hundred pounds in an exigency, or anywhere between four pounds and one hundred pounds, as to send one weighing four pounds?

Mr. CAMERON, of Illinois. If you send any thing, why not send one thousand pounds or one hundred thousand pounds? There must be a limit somewhere.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Such large packages can be sent as freight.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly such packages can be sent as freight, and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] after a life-time of business extending all over the country, understands that a package of one hundred pounds is not going through the mails at eight cents a pound.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I regard the whole policy of carrying general merchandise by mail at less than cost a wrong. If you can carry packages of four pounds, you can certainly carry packages of eight pounds. Let us increase the limit to eight pounds and be liberal, if we are going into the transportation business.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not in favor of increasing the limit to eight pounds. I think four pounds a fair limit. I have shown that such packages can be carried without impeding the mails and without doing any damage to anybody. I have shown that it is a matter of revenue and profit to the Department and convenience to the people.

I have shown that nobody can find any considerable number of people who ask for this kind of matter to be shut out of the mail unless indeed it be those interested in the express companies.

Some gentleman asks what is the difference in revenue under the law prior to the 4th of March last and that which has been since adopted? I reply that the revenue on this kind of matter, as nearly as can be ascertained, has fallen off since the postage was increased, while the expenses of the Post-Office Department have not grown any less as the revenue has decreased.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Has the gentleman from Illinois any returns from the express companies, and does he know whether or not their income has increased on that kind of matter?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I suspect the income of the express companies has very largely increased, for I notice while this repeal is pending there has been a very great shaking among the dry-bones in that quarter. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to add in that regard, but I think it is meet and proper we should repeal this law at once. It out to be done as a rebuke of the manner in which the law now proposed to be repealed was smuggled through the House during the last hours of the session.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I ask my colleague, as he uses the words he has in connection with the passage of that bill, to bear in mind that it was a Senate amendment, deliberately considered there, reported to the House in the bill coming from the Senate, was nonconcurred in and sent with other matters to the committee on conference and by them reported to the House. I ask him to state also, in justice to the present as well as the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that such is the fact.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have no stones to throw at the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or at the present chairman, for I believe both to be competent, honorable men. I am not abusing them, but only abusing this mode of legislation. I am calling the attention of the House to that abuse in hope it may be corrected. It was an abuse; the law was smuggled through. The amendment was concurred in by recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, including the gentleman from Pennsylvania as well as the gentleman from Ohio. It was done during the last two or three hours of the session. The bill came in with over one hundred amendments appropriating over $38,000,000. The House and committee had been working night and day, and I think the provision went through without the committee or members understanding the scope of the amendment. I should like to see, if it cannot be done in any other way, and I suppose it cannot, a constitutional amendment prohibiting hereafter any legislation of any character upon appropriation bills other than appropriating money in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Do away with the rule allowing it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That would do some good if we could repeal the amendment to the rule adopted the other day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for ten minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is due to the history of this case that the House should know precisely what was done at the last session, how it was done, why it was done, and what it is now proposed to do in the way of undoing what was then done. I think I can state in a few words that the legislation of the last Congress on this subject originated in the Post-Office Department in a letter from the Postmaster-General, a copy of which I hold in my hand, marked Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 93, addressed to Hon. Alexander Ramsey, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the Senate, which concluded in these words:

> The law has been in operation for so short a time I am reluctant to have any radical change in it; but I suggest the rate of postage on merchandise be doubled, that is, the rate be one cent for each ounce or fraction thereof, instead of one cent for each two ounces.
> MARSHALL JEWELL,
> Postmaster-General.

That paper reached the Senate very late in the session. In the Senate on the sundry civil appropriation bill, the day before the close of the session I think, an amendment supposed to be in exact accordance with the recommendation of the Postmaster-General was offered and adopted. At two o'clock in the morning of the last day of the session, when we had been sitting all night, the bill came back from the Senate with about one hundred amendments to it. The Committee on Appropriations, of which I was the chairman, met, as the old members will remember, and went as rapidly as they could over the various amendments. When we came to that one the member of the committee from Indiana, Mr. Tyner, who had charge of the post-office appropriation bill—and it is not any discredit to anybody to say that he understood more thoroughly postal legislation than any other man in the House; certainly he was the equal of any other in that respect—was asked what he thought of the amendment. His answer was that it was in pursuance of a recommendation of the Post-Office Department to double the postage on merchandise, and on that suggestion it was adopted unanimously by the committee. I believe I am correct in saying no member of the committee, not even the gentleman from Indiana himself, understood the language of the amendment put on by the Senate included anything else than merchandise. After the bill had passed, for it did pass, it was ascertained that the language of the amendment covered not only merchandise, but also covered transient newspapers and pamphlets. In that we were all surprised. It covered the whole of the third class instead of merely the merchandise portion of the third class. I very deeply regretted that, for it was against all notions of proper legislation concerning postal matter to have doubled the rate of printed matter. But I was in favor and am still in favor of the legislation then adopted in reference to merchandise.

I have now stated how the legislation came about; I have stated the reasons why it come about. I am sorry that my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] should speak of it as something smuggled in. It was put in, or intended at least to be put in, on the open public recommendation of the head of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RANDALL. Why did he not send that letter to the committee of the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. He sent it to the committee of the other branch.

Mr. RANDALL. Why did he wait until the last hours of the session and send in such a letter to put such a proceeding on the country as that, when he had the entire session to bring the matter before Congress?

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot answer for the Postmaster-General in that regard. I was not in his counsel in this action, but simply state the facts.

I entirely agree with my friend from Illinois that it is one of the worst things that can happen to change laws on appropriation bills. I shall be happily surprised if gentlemen on the other side do not find that they have committed a most serious mistake in adopting a rule to enable them to put all sorts of legislation upon appropriation bills. But I do not enter upon that question now beyond saying that I agree with my friend from Illinois.

Now, on the question of merchandise transportation, I may say that I was not unfamiliar with this subject before this action of Congress last session. We had debated that question previously. We began some years ago by allowing small packages of merchandise not to exceed eight ounces to go in the mail, and it was found so convenient to let packages of eight ounces go that the limit was increased and again increased until it went up to four pounds. And what has been the result of that? We have entered upon a scale constantly graduating upward of carrying mere merchandise in bulk by mail; and if any man can show me any legitimate place to stop until I can load a car in Chicago with wheat in bulk, and having put postage stamps on the outside of the car ship it to New York, he can see some logical line of division that I am unable to see. I say that in entering on this business of carrying merchandise by mail we are logically bound to carry the entire freight transportation of this country. We would not be changing the principle. It is simply a question of amount, of degree, and not of kind.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I would ask the gentleman if merchandise is not carried in the mails in almost every other country?

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps so. I am not informed and cannot answer. But I will say to the gentleman that when the statement was made before the Committee on Appropriations at the last Congress that the ordinary idea of our postal organization was to transmit packages, I took the pains to make a thorough study of the historical origin of our postal system, and found that in the first resolution offered by Benjamin Franklin in the Continental Congress and onward through the entire course of it till within the last twelve years there never entered into our postal service the ideas in any form of any transportation except of written or printed intelligence. The Post Office was established to transmit intelligence, and anything else is a departure from the original idea on which it was based, and a departure depending of course wholly on the discretion of the House of Representatives and Senate as to how wide that departure shall be.

But I am not here particularly now to discuss so radical a change, though I should vote for it, as to throw out the merchandise clause altogether. I think it ought not to be in the postal law; but if you are bound to have merchandise in, if you are determined as a matter of public convenience to go into the transportation business, let us secure one thing at least, let us make the transportation pay itself. Let us at least insist that when we do a general transportation business, when we are able to take our jack-boots from our feet and send them to California at a cheaper rate than we can send newspapers of the same bulk, or as cheap, far cheaper than you can send letters by weight, let us at least demand that this merchandise shall pay for itself.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him in one thing? I know he has no desire to misstate. Newspapers go through the mails at twenty dollars a ton or two cents a pound. Third-class merchandise will go through the mails under this bill at eight cents a pound.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me two or three minutes more?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the House will possess themselves of a letter addressed to the Postmaster-General by George S. Bangs, superintendent of railway mail service, they will find a very careful and elaborate review of this whole subject of the transportation of third-class matter. He does not agree with me that we ought not to transport merchandise in the mail. He thinks we may do it within reasonable limits, but he does insist that in the interest of the public service it shall be required to pay for itself, and he shows in that letter that third-class matter, for which we receive $4,758,643.88, costs us to transport it $8,720,000; and the record shows that that amount is increasing fearfully every year. They have but begun the work. The great wholesale houses of New York are absolutely rivaling the country merchants all over the West by shipping and selling by samples their dry goods. They send them by mail to all the districts of the West, and thus use the mails at a far cheaper rate than we have to pay for the transportation to help them to do their selling. Now, sir, if the merchants of this country want to use our mails let them pay the cost of transportation to the United States.

The portion of the bill which relates to transient newspapers I am anxious to see repealed and changed; but not that part which enlarges the transportation of merchandise at the rates fixed therein.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that there is only 1 per cent. of merchandise which passes through the mails, while there are 99 per cent. of the matter he proposes to raise the postage on?

Mr. GARFIELD. I hold in my hand Mr. Bangs's letter to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. And here is his letter written in February last, which answers the one to which the gentleman from Ohio refers.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to say but a very few words on this subject. The law as it stood prior to the last session of Congress is to be found in sections 3878 and 3911 of the Revised Statutes. This law provides that transient newspapers, pamphlets, books, corrected proof-sheets, book manuscripts, photographs, seeds, cuttings, scions, small samples of merchandise, and some other mail matter shall go through the mails at a very limited price, at a cost of one cent for two ounces and every fraction of an ounce. That was found exceedingly convenient to all parts of the country for the transmission of the enumerated articles authorized to be sent through the mails. At the close of the last session of Congress, as has been properly said, there was put upon an appropriation bill a clause which changed this law, and it got through without being understood generally by members of the House. I do not attribute any fault to any gentleman on this floor, for I believe that all who acted upon the subject designed to act in good faith and from convictions of duty. But the fact is nevertheless true that the change was made without being understood by the House generally. That change was undoubtedly made at the instance of the express companies of the country and made in their interest and to the general detriment of the public, the interests of the people. Now, I undertake to say that no gentleman here will legislate out of malice toward the express companies or toward any one of the great institutions of the country, and certainly I will not. These express companies are valuable agencies to carry on our commercial and other transactions. In what I have to say and in the vote I shall give I shall not speak or vote because of hostility to the express companies or to anybody; but I shall speak and vote as I conceive my duty to be, in common with others, to secure the interests of the people of the country at large.

Sir, I suppose no gentleman on this floor will deny that so far as Congress has any specific power it is our duty to exercise it in a manner to promote the "general welfare" of the people. I am in favor of this bill to restore the postage law substantially as it was on what is called "third-class matter," for two or three plain reasons, which I will state.

First of all it will secure the convenience and interests of the people generally. The mails reach every village and neighborhood throughout the whole land. The express companies do no such thing. And if you cut off the privilege of sending books, seeds, and scions, packages of merchandise, and other specified articles of "third-class matter" through the mails, you deny to a large portion of the people in the rural sections, in the small villages, and in neighborhoods where there are no villages, the privilege of receiving these articles at any convenient distance from their homes. Sir, I think it is our duty to secure the interests of the people by making the provision proposed in this bill, which will enable the mails to reach the people of every village and neighborhood in the land with the articles known as "third-class matter." Unless we do this, we do not secure to them privileges which they very much need and very properly desire.

I am in favor of this bill for a second reason. The rate of postage fixed by this bill is such as to enable the Post-Office Department to carry the matter proposed without loss, but in fact at a profit. It is proposed that parties sending the specified matters shall pay eight cents per pound. The gentleman who just spoke upon this subject [Mr. CANNON, of Illinois] has, I think, sufficiently demonstrated that this is a rate that can be made to pay. Why, sir, merchandise can be carried all around the globe for eight cents per pound, and less. And if the Post-Office Department cannot carry this matter at eight cents per pound I would retrench, cut down salaries and expenses of everybody connected with the Post-Office Department, in order that we might secure the transportation of the matter proposed by this bill at the price fixed in it. That is what I would do.

Now, sir, there is a demand for this bill coming up from every section and every interest in the country almost, and which I think ought to be heeded in this Hall. I have before me a letter from a very intelligent gentleman connected with a large publishing house in Dayton, Ohio, an extract from which I will read. He says:

One cent an ounce on books is too high. There are thousands of people who can only get books by mail. At present rates it costs 20 per cent. of the value of the book to get it to the customer. And then is not a bound book as much an educator of the people and a diffuser of knowledge as a pamphlet or a newspaper? * * * Let all means of knowledge in the way of transient printed matter be put at one cent for every two ounces or fraction thereof.

I also have a letter from a well-informed constituent of mine, who is in the fruit-tree, flower, shrub, and vine nursery business, who says:

We have other interests besides reading matter that are very much closed up by the high postage set on grain, seeds, scions, plants, &c.

Here is an appeal from the fruit and agricultural interest which very justly demands our attention, commands our respect, and deserves our encouragement. In this connection I also read the following from a paper called the American Grocer, of January 15, which says:

Our readers will remember that during the closing hours of the last Congress a bill was passed in the interest of the express companies doubling the rates of postage on "third-class matter," which includes pamphlets and transient publications, unsealed circulars, books and book manuscript, and a variety of miscellaneous articles under four pounds in weight, among which samples of merchandise are a principal item. This law created a great deal of dissatisfaction, which the Postmaster-General proposes to allay by having a bill passed restoring the old rate on printed matter, except books and book manuscript and the miscellaneous articles above noted, of which samples of merchandise are a large part. We trust, however, that this narrow view of the question may not prevail, and that the law may be restored to its former status. We think we fairly represent the sentiment of a large majority of the public when we state that nothing short of this will give entire satisfaction. The sending of samples of merchandise through the mail had become a great convenience, both to the retail and wholesale merchants of the country. It tends greatly to facilitate business, and we can see no good reason why the general merchant should not have the privilege of sending samples of his merchandise through the mails as cheaply as the publisher who sends specimen newspapers, phamphlets, &c. In most cases the weight is no more and the space occupied not as large. Both tend greatly to increase commerce and bind the different sections of the country together in bonds of mutual interest. Another item which has proved of very great value to the general public has been the wide distribution by our Postal Department of small parcels of valuable seeds. It is of the greatest importance to the country that the best varieties of agricultural products should be cultivated, and some of our best crops at this time are the result of distribution of seeds in this manner. We are informed by seedsmen that the increase in rates practically shuts out a large amount of this business. We go in for making the postal system of value to the public in the distribution of merchandise samples bulbs, seeds, &c.

This presentation of facts, the argument here embodied, seems to be reasonable, just, and conclusive. If a man wants to send cuttings and scions from his fruit-tree nursery to sections of the country either remote or near which no express company reaches, why not, in the interests of agriculture and of the people of the country, allow such cuttings, seeds, and scions to go to all parts of the country through the mails? And if express companies reach other portions of the country, why not give the people a choice of means for carrying the specified articles? By this means we prevent unreasonable exactions; we cut off monopoly, which in almost every form is ruinous. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] put the inquiry, If you carry two or four pounds why not carry one hundred pounds? I think there is a very good reason why we should carry four-pound parcels while we do not carry one-hundred-pound packages. There are, as every one knows, facilities by water and railroad and express transportation for carrying one-hundred-pound packages to every part of the country where it is desirable to send them. There are no such facilities for reaching all parts of the country where it is desirable to send four-pound parcels except by mail. That is the reason which seems to me entirely sufficient. And the Post-Office Department, as I have already said, may properly be made to prevent unreasonable charges by express companies. With reasonable charges for railroad, water, and express transportation nobody would think of sending a one-hundred pound package by mail. There is a wide distinction between ordinary freight and the matter which it is convenient to send by mail. The country affords facilities for sending as freight or by express every package of one hundred pounds. It will be so sent.

But our experience since the change in the postal law made by the last Congress teaches us that there is a necessity to restore the mail facilities. The express companies took advantage of the absence of mail facilities for "third-class matter" and imposed upon the people onerous charges, from which it is our duty and our interest to relieve them. I might answer the question put by the gentleman from New York by asking another. If we should surrender to the express companies the carrying of all matter except letters and similar parcels, why not surrender them also? The answer is plain. With no law to regulate or limit the charges of express companies, and with no competition by mail facilities, unreasonable charges would be imposed on the people. The Post-Office Department is authorized by the Constitution. It is our duty to operate it to secure the "general welfare," and this requires us to pass the bill now under consideration.

We are not proposing to carry packages at one-half cent per pound as has been said, but eight cents per pound. If the mails were authorized to carry one-hundred-pound packages they would never be sent, because such packages could be carried cheaper by railroad, as every man knows. Would any one in New York send one-hundred-pound packages through the mail to any portion of the country? Not one; for the reason that the express and railroad companies can carry such freight cheaper than the rate fixed by law for mail matter.

In every view this bill is a matter of necessity and a matter of justice.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will yield that to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know that I shall occupy all that time. I am very glad that those who have in the past had any connection with this legislation have disavowed it. I am also glad that the Postmaster-General has found it necessary at the beginning of this session to suggest a repeal of a law which it is clearly proved he was instrumental in having inaugurated. I am also free to say that all these blunders which are committed in the haste of legislation at the end of a session are sure to be in behalf of monopoly, and in no instance, so far as I can recollect, in behalf of the people.

I am not going to inquire into motives in connection with this legislation; I will speak directly of the effect of it. One effect of it was a direct interference with the transmission of newspapers through the mails by doubling the rates of postage on them. Another effect was to interfere with the convenience of the people by preventing or hindering the transmission through the mails of four-pound packages. There was a further effect, and that was to augment the receipts of the express companies of this country to the extent of a quarter of a million of dollars. If I were to venture to speak of motives I might suggest what was the motive power of such legislation; but I will not do so.

What does the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads propose at this time? They propose the absolute repeal of this legislation which seems to have crept into an appropriation bill almost wholly unknown to the members of either House. They propose to put the law back just where it was when this strange legislation was put upon the statute-books, so that newspapers and intelligence shall be transmitted through the mails as heretofore, and also that the great body of the people shall not be called upon any longer to pay this tribute to express companies. I am very glad to say that there is among the people a universal demand, without any partisan feeling whatever, for the repeal of this legislation.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I will be willing to receive the condemnation of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] if he can make it apply at all to any such legislation which may hereafter occur by the amendment of our rules to which he has referred. I will receive his condemnation whenever he may find me or anybody on this side of the House exercising the privileges under that rule in such an infamous manner as privileges were exercised at the last session of Congress under the rule then adopted and which we have repealed. Allow me to say to the gentleman that this legislation which we now seek to repeal was not accomplished under any rule of this House; it crept through under the shadow of a conference committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman tell me precisely what he means by speaking of the legislation of this House? Does the gentleman charge it upon the Committee on Appropriations? He was here at the last session.

Mr. RANDALL. I have exonerated the House from any blame for this legislation. But I say to you that whenever this side of the House, by reason of any power secured through the adoption of the rule the other day, shall be guilty of incorporating in any appropriation bill any such legislation as this, then I will be ready to receive your condemnation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman hold the Committee on Appropriations or this side of the House responsible for doing any guilty or infamous thing in connection with this legislation?

Mr. RANDALL. I hold the committee of conference guilty of an omission of scrutiny in the passage of such legislation as this on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe there is a passage in the Old Testament somewhat to this effect: "Let not him that putteth on the harness boast as him that putteth it off."

Mr. RANDALL. I have not boasted. I have condemned where I thought I should do so. I propose not to appear here as an advocate of express companies or of anything but the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. By order of the House all general debate is closed upon this bill.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I now call the previous question.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I desire to make a brief explanation.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose if I have the right to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot yield; all general debate is closed by order of the House.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Then I insist upon the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted this bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Military Academy.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, the committee will now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

The Clerk then read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILTON] who reported this bill is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations is now fairly entering upon its work for this session, and I have deemed it fitting to take some survey of the subject-matters that will come before the House this winter in the way of appropriations. The field, Mr. Chairman, is a broad one. Our annual expenditures are immense. Governments, like families, cost more and more as they grow; and the cost of governments, like that of families, is apt to increase in a geometrical ratio with the growth of its people.

Any man who contrasts the population and the wealth of this country now with what they were in the first days of the Government will be reconciled to a great advance in its expenses. In that wonderful chapter of Macaulay, wherein he presents the material condition of Great Britain at the time when the crown passed from Charles II to his brother, the historian notes, as a remarkable fact, that in the time covered by two long lives the taxation of the British people had been increased thirty-fold. We have, Mr. Chairman, owing to great events in our history, especially owing to the events of the last fifteen years, gone beyond what in Great Britain seemed startling to Macaulay. It could hardly have been imagined by any person living in the administration of John Quincy Adams that in fifty years from that time there would be collected from the American people annually and spent in one way or another nearly $300,000,000. There is no subject of greater interest to the people than that involved in the question of how all this money is spent, and it is for that reason that I have ventured to trespass upon the attention of the House at this time.

In starting it is worth while to bear in mind that, in time of profound peace, with no war apparently lowering upon the horizon, and no preparation for war being made, the last Administration before the rebellion broke out—that of Mr. Buchanan—spent in one year $75,000,000; and during its continuance ran the Government in debt nearly $100,000,000.

The war launched us into an almost fathomless sea of expenditure. There is nothing, sir, that wastes like war. The things that we actually needed cost enormously. The things that we wasted in overcost and over-supply, in "cutting our eye-teeth," to use a New England phrase—by building up the fortunes and learning the ways of swindling contractors and thieves—cost us nearly as much more. And while we were undergoing this experience we heaped up additionally the measure of indebtedness that we must meet in time of peace by going through the dance of inflation, which doubled and trebled the cost of everything that we actually had or were cheated into believing that we had.

What wonder then that the figures leaped up from tens of millions to hundreds of millions, and that, marvelous as were the efforts of our people in the payment of taxes to keep down the public debt, so great beyond this was the demand at the time that we piled up a national indebtedness that will, to meet principal and interest, mortgage the lives of generations.

I have here a table giving the figures of the net expenditures of the Government for the years from 1856 to 1875, inclusive. It begins at $69,571,025.79 for the year ending June 30, 1856. In 1865 it reaches as high as $1,297,555,224.41, and in 1875, $274,623,392. In these nineteen years the culminating point of expenditure was reached in the year that the war ended, when, as I have said, it reached more than $1,200,000,000. From that day the expenditures have been falling in the years immediately succeeding the war by tremendous steps and more gradually since, the scale that we now spend being for the year ending June 30, 1875, $274,623,392.84.

1857	67, 795, 707 66
1858	74, 185, 270 39
1859	69, 070, 976 74
1860	63, 130, 598 39

These expenditures, especially of the greatest years, are enormous. That we were able to command means and credit to the extent required surprised both friends and enemies. If my object were different, it would be a grateful task for me to recall to the memory of gentlemen before me the Herculean efforts made by our people in the payment of taxes to keep down the public debt, bearing such impositions as no nation ever before bore. But I have not the time to go into that matter. I will only say that in the years between 1863 and 1868, inclusive, the American people paid in taxes into the national Treasury over $?,200,000,000. I cannot pursue this further.

Any gentleman examining this column of figures (and they are taken from the official reports of the Treasury Department) will see that from 1866 through 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, and 1874 there was a gradual decrease with the exception of the year 1873, when there was an increased appropriation for the War Department, and the expenditures for once rose beyond that of the preceding year.

I have not the time to go into details, and it is not my object to go back to all those years; but I do propose to bring before the House the work which has been done in the direction of curtailing expenses within the last three years. In the first session of the Forty-third Congress, in the year 1874, the gentleman from Ohio on my left, who was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] did a most valuable work, for which every student of the expenditures of the Government must ever thank him. We were then, as now, confronted with lessening receipts and the necessity of reducing appropriations in order that the needs of the Government might be met by its revenues. General GARFIELD, whose philosophical mind and practical industry are well known to the country, in his study of the subject divided the whole body of our expenditures into three great classes. The first class covered amounts paid during the fiscal year 1873—the year to which he first applied his classification—on account of expenses growing directly out of the late war. They included, for instance, the interest on the public debt, more than $100,000,000; pensions, nearly thirty millions; expenses of the national loan, nearly three millions, and the cost of collecting the internal revenue, which was an imposition caused purely by the war, and, with various other demands for payment which the Government must recognize, growing out of the war, ranging in some cases from a few thousand dollars to hundreds of thousands of dollars in other cases. This class amounted in 1873 to $159,232,416.81. Now there was then, as there is now, no shirking of this bill. It came to us as an inheritance of the war, and will rest upon the American people until, with increasing revenue and prosperity, we have paid the principal of the public debt and the widows and orphans and soldiers who are pensioned have passed forever from among us. But until then the bill for this class, so carefully studied and prepared by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] will be before us, I repeat, as one which cannot be shirked.

The second classification, covering the military and naval establishments, amounted in 1873—the military appropriation being $32,524,548.64 and the naval $21,474,433.61—in the aggregate to $53,998,982.25. The third class covered the civil service, comprehending all expenditures not included in the other two classes, embracing salaries, the cost of collecting customs, public buildings for post-offices, custom-houses, and light-houses, expense of the Post-Office Department over and above its annual revenue, navy-yards, and various items, amounting in all to $79,803,847.27.

General GARFIELD, following the analytical bent of his mind, calculated the percentages of expenditures embraced by these several classes. The first, the war expenses coming directly from it, were 54 per cent. of our entire expenditures. The military establishments—the War and Navy—were 18 per cent.; and the civil service, the third class, embracing all not comprehended in the others, 28 per cent. In the succeeding year the same analysis was applied to the expenditures for the year 1874. And I have done the same thing in a table I have here for the last year of 1875. I have taken advantage of the classification of my friend from Ohio, and have carried it out into the last year it was possible, to wit, the year ending June 30, 1875, the last fiscal year for which we have any returns.

It is an interesting matter to see how the percentage of these expenditures has been maintained. In the last fiscal year, the last we have had, the war expenses—those incident to the war—are $147,882,034.75, or 53.7 per cent. of the expenses. In the year previous this class was 53.3 per cent. and the year previous to that 54 per cent. The second class, including the military establishments, the War and Navy, amounted in the last year to $48,314,499.50, or 17.5 per cent. of the whole. And here is a fact which I commend to the gentlemen on the other side who contemplate an attack upon these establishments, that, while the class from which there is no escape, and which I think few gentlemen would be in favor of cutting down, has about maintained itself during the past three years, the War and Navy establishments for the year ending June 30, 1875, amount to 17.5 per cent., while during the previous year it was 20.4 per cent. and the year before 18 per cent.

The next class, including the general civil establishments, amounts to $78,426,858.59, or 28.6 per cent. of the entire expense, against 25.9 last year and 23 per cent. the year before.

I now give the full tables:

Now, I wish to invite attention to the work of Congress in the first session of the Forty-third Congress in the reduction of expenses, as shown in the appropriation bills for the year ending June 30, 1875. My friend and leader, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will be glad to learn how much the road in which he is so ardently pressing has been trodden before. The following table shows the difference between the appropriations for the years 1874 and 1875. It is taken from the official Treasury digest of appropriations.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Warrant Division, July 1, 1874.

*There appeared for the first time in this bill an appropriation of $2,216,763 for defraying expenses incident to the national loan for the current fiscal year, the appropriations for that object having heretofore been indefinite. There also appears an appropriation for official postage-stamps required by the various Departments of $1,865,900 in 1874, and $1,707,600 in 1875, without any corresponding appropriation in 1873. To arrive at a just comparison of the appropriations made at each session of Congress the amounts appropriated for postage and expenses of national loan in 1875 and for postage in 1874 should be deducted from the totals of those years, leaving the amended totals.

This table shows a reduction of $19,331,405.62.

In the note appended to it, the Secretary properly states that for the first time the annual bills of the last session contained $2,216,763 for expenses of the national loan.

But the amount expended in the preceding year for the same purpose was $2,806,863.94; and the last session of Congress should have been credited with a further reduction to the amount of the difference between these sums, namely, $590,100.94. This item, added to the amount of reduction stated by the Secretary, gives a reduction of $19,923,506.56.

The difference between this amount and the amount estimated in my speech of June 23, 1874, consists in the two items, which, as I then stated, were not included in my estimate. One was the $4,000,000 appropriated for the naval emergency arising from our trouble with Spain, which should not be considered as a part of the ordinary cost of carrying on the Government; the other was the aggregate of all the relief and pension acts passed at the last session, which amounted to $2,121,540.86; these acts were not under the charge of the Committee on Appropriations, and they amounted to a larger sum than I supposed they would.

But including the relief acts, and leaving out the naval emergency appropriation, the actual reduction in the ordinary appropriations for the public service at the last session was $24,000,000 less than at the preceding session.

Without—for my time is passing away—without discussing details this table shows that in the year ending June 30, 1874, all the appropriation bills amounted to $170,424,800.82. And let me say here that upon this part of my subject relating to the reduction of appropriations I use in treating of aggregates the sums of the various appropriation bills, not reckoning the permanent appropriations, which we have little or nothing to do with. The work that we are engaged in in reducing expenditures must be done upon these bills. My friend in front of me [Mr. HOLMAN] knows that with all his desire, proper and just as it is to retrench and cut down expenditures, the permanent appropriations, like that for the interest on the national debt and some others, are things with which we cannot and do not expect to meddle, and so the figures I give embrace that domain of expenditure which is fair work for Congress.

For the year 1874, as I have said, the expenditures were $170,424,800.82. Under the leadership of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] Congress in that session, the first of the Forty-third Congress, reduced the annual appropriation bills so that they amounted for the year ending June 30, 1875, to $151,106,128.27. Following this table which I have already given are certain remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, who used these same figures in a speech made here in 1875, in which he shows, as anybody will see who reads it, that in addition to this $19,000,000 reduction, shown on these appropriation bills, the Committee on Appropriations and Congress should be credited further with certain items—for instance, the emergency bill giving to the Navy Department, at the time when war was deemed to be imminent with Spain, $4,000,000. In addition to that the appropriation bills ought to be credited that year with a sum which had formerly been permanent, to wit, the appropriation for the issuing of the national loan, which added to the appropriation bill something like $3,000,000—a gentleman beside me says $3,800,000. And the gentleman from Ohio, in casting up what Congress should be credited with, comes to this conclusion:

> Including the relief act, leaving out the naval emergency appropriation, the actual reduction in the ordinary appropriations for the public service at the last session was $24,000,000 less than at the preceding session.

That was then in sum and substance, Mr. Chairman, the work of Congress that session in the reduction of expenditures. Not a small work, sir; but a great work; work done faithfully, and, what is better still, upon which there has been no back step taken.

Let me enumerate here some of the reforms and retrenchments made by Congress through its organ, the Committee on Appropriations, in the first session of the last Congress. There was first what I have alluded to, the national loan expense, which was formerly paid by an indefinite appropriation of a percentage on the entire issue, and was a thing as entirely in charge of a Bureau of the Treasury Department as is the private business of any gentleman on this floor in his own control. This Bureau spent $3,800,000 a year, a sum as large as that which ran the Government in the first year of the present century. There was no let or hinderance on that expenditure. There was no limitation as to amount of labor. There was no limitation as to salaries paid. But the Committee on Appropriations took this evil by the throat; they took it from this irresponsible control and transferred it to a regular appropriation bill, making salaries for the employés, fixing the amount of money to be spent for materials, and, in addition to all this, reducing the amount spent over half a million dollars. Now, Mr. Chairman, that work is done. My friend on my left [Mr. RANDALL] cannot do it over again. He can keep up on his bills the system brought in by the old committee, but the work is the old committee's, not his.

There was an evil of a like kind in the War Department. Enlisted men were allowed to be employed very much as in the Printing Bureau, without any limitation or control, and we found that some hundreds were so employed. That evil was cured like the other, and in the same way. In the naval bill, the Marine Corps men were reduced in number. In the Army bill there was a reduction of five thousand men, so that the Army to-day stands as a reduced organization by the work of the Forty-third Congress.

The salary bill that passed in that Congress reduced salaries something more than a million dollars. The departmental forces were taken in hand by the committee and after long and arduous labor were in many places cut down. The drones were driven out, the force was diminished, and where there had been in a single Bureau a hundred clerks the committee would cut down the number to sixty, seventy, or eighty, as mature deliberation showed it could be done without crippling the service of the Government. The Committee on Appropriations reported to the House a clause increasing the hours of labor in the Departments, because it believed that without any oppression upon employés more time could be spent by them in labor to the advantage of the service, and it therefore provided for an additional hour of work each day.

We were beaten on the floor of the House, and the hours of labor remained as they had been before, and so continued until during the past year, when by order of the different Departments an hour a day was added to the work of the clerical force.

Now let any man say, Mr. Chairman, here what I have frequently heard upon this floor, that these appropriations are no test of real reduction, because reductions are frequently made with a view to deficiencies, and that it is simply a show, a pretext, and that the deficiencies for the succeeding year will make it all up. Now, sir, it is worth while to look at the deficiencies bearing upon these reductions. Sir, in the succeeding year after this reduction by Congress the deficiency appropriations amounted to but about four million dollars, a less sum than had ever been called for in ten years, so that this reduction was bona fide; it was made in good faith, and it was carried out by the Departments.

But, Mr. Chairman, I must hurry on. The good work did not stop here; it did not stop in 1874. At the next session of the Forty-third Congress the committee reduced the appropriations further by the sum of $7,292,817.39, as the table which I hold in my hand shows. So that in those two years there was a reduction in the appropriations of the Government of nearly $31,000,000, and the deficiency bills for that year, instead of being increased by these further reductions in the two years of the Forty-third Congress, had run down so that they only amounted to $800,000 for the whole year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when we have the annual appropriation bills and know that they are correct, and have also got the annual deficiency bills for the year succeeding, we have the question clinched. In any appropriation bill no man can tell what the reduction has been until he knows the deficiencies resulting from it. But in these two years, showing a reduction of appropriations of $31,000,000, which in so much lessened the burdens of the people, the good faith of the reduction is shown by the deficiency bills lessening largely each year; and herein let me say a word in regard to deficiency bills. It was one of the greatest works accomplished in years past by Congress this holding the Departments inside the limit of what had been appropriated. There had been a pernicious practice for years of spending without regard to the appropriations and then coming in for deficiency bills. But while the deficiencies for 1870 and 1871 and following years ranged from fourteen million to twenty-three million dollars a year, in 1874 they were brought down to $4,000,000 and in 1875 to $8,000,000. For the next year I am told that, with the exception of a deficiency in the pay of the Army, which is a matter of computation only upon a fixed rate of pay, and an Indian deficiency, the whole amount will be less than $400,000.

This was, as I have said, a good work. It was a work that any Congress may be proud of, and that any committee that had a share in it may be proud of. It is a work that any party which sustained it and carried it out may be proud of. And this reduction of deficiences the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will bear me out in saying is not the least but perhaps the greatest of all this work.

Now, sir, I am asked if my conclusion from all this is that no further reduction can be made, and that this Congress has nothing to do but to take the estimates of the Departments, or at best follow the appropriations of last year? My answer is, No; by no means.

Had this House been of the same political complexion as the last, and had the Committee on Appropriations been constructed just as it was last year, I have no doubt that it would have gone on in the line before inaugurated, cutting down expenses here and there, always with this result, that each year's reduction would be less easy, because we should each year approach nearer and nearer to the base-line of the actual needs of the Government. But while admitting that there is work yet to do, I do not mean that anybody here or any man in the country who does me the honor to read what I say shall be mislead by the oft-repeated cry as to the extravagant expenditures under the present Administration or that the republican party has from year to year added to the burdens of the people by its appropriations and expenditures. I do not mean, Mr. Chairman, that it shall be assumed that there is to be and could be no check to this wastefnl flow until the democratic party was placed at the head-gates, and I want to warn my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that in his efforts he does not spend his time and energies upon a field that has been already cropped. There is ground that is worth going over yet, and I want to help him in going over that ground. But I want him to bear in mind the French proverb, that the man who goes out after the plucked cherry comes home empty handed.

And this leads me naturally to some scrutiny of the work before us for the coming year. If any gentleman has been studying the Book of Estimates he has no doubt found upon page 175 three parallel columns showing the appropriations for 1876, the present fiscal year, the estimates for the same year, and the estimates of the Departments for the succeeding year, that ending June 30, 1877, for which we must appropriate in this Congress and upon which we are now embarked, one of the bills being that now before this committee. Here are the three columns, and they show an aggregate of appropriations for the present year, the one in which we are now living, of $293,166,177.57. Against this are the estimates of the different Departments for the succeeding year, amounting to $314,612,668.48, or $21,446,430.90 in excess of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

At the first blush this is not an encouraging feature to the honest retrencher, that the Departments should call for $21,000,000 more than we appropriated last year. I am free to own that if we were obliged to go on and appropriate this additional amount it would largely neutralize the good work of the past years. But I want to show that not only is there no need of this, but that the increased estimates are natural under the system pursued in the different Departments.

It is no new thing for Congress to be confronted by estimates larger than the appropriations of the preceding years. The Departments look upon the question of expenditures from one point of view, Congress looks at them from another. The Departments look at appropriations and expenditures from the view of accomplishing all proper things as fast as possible. Congress has learned to look upon expenditures from the point of view of only expending under our present enormous taxation such sums as are necessary for the fair running of the machinery of the Government.

Now this is illustrated by the different Departments in which these estimates are made up. The table which I here insert shows where these increases are found. I am glad to say that in the legislative establishment the estimates are $98,000 less than the appropriations of last year; so that there is no call upon us for an increase there. The appropriations for the last year for the executive establishment were $317,000 more than are asked for for the next year; so that there is no question of extravagant estimates there. In the judicial establishment the appropriations for this year are the same as the estimates for the next year within $200. In the Department of Indian Affairs the estimates are $662,000 more than the appropriation of last year. In the Pension Bureau the estimates are $466,000 more than the appropriations of last year.

In public works—I ask gentlemen to bear the figures in mind. The estimates for public works are $11,836,348.20 more than the appropriations last year for the same purpose. That is a very large proportion of the increased estimates which the Secretary of the Treasury has sent in for the coming year. What are embraced by public works? In the first place, every custom-house, every post-office, and every light-house that is erected from Maine to California. If a member is desirous of having a post-office or a custom-house erected in his district or in his town, he besieges the Secretary of the Treasury in season and out of season, until at last he worries that official into sending in an estimate of the cost of such a building.

If the Secretary of the Treasury, like the present incumbent, is a firm man and can say "no" when he ought to, then a member who wants a post-office or a custom-house gets a resolution through this House directing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an estimate; it is in his annual list of estimates. The river and harbor bill, too, shows how these estimates are increased. The Corps of Engineers, who have charge of those works, are every year directed by Congress to make new surveys. There has not been a river or harbor bill passed by Congress for years but at its tail end there is a long list of surveys directed. The Corps of Engineers make the surveys, estimate what the works will cost, and the estimates are sent by the Secretary of the Treasury as a part of the estimates of the Department under which the Corps of Engineers operate.

So the estimates are swollen, and in this one item alone I am glad to find over eleven millions of the twenty-one millions of increase. That need not trouble anybody; we can get along without any new buildings. I am glad in this to join hands with my friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in his work of cutting down expenditures. These figures represent not what is asked for, but an increase over last year. The item last year was $16,785,000. For the next year the estimate is $28,000,000 and odd. I believe we can get along with considerably less than the $16,000,000 which we appropriated last year, and, if so, then we will have wiped out every additional increase that is called for by the Book of Estimates. And the Secretary of the Treasury is not to be held as himself responsible for these. He sends them in from the other Departments as their estimates, made up in the manner that I have indicated.

In the postal service there is an additional deficiency estimated at $905,397. This morning, Mr. Chairman, has furnished an instance of the rule that we may as well take home to our breasts with reference to this Department: "Those who dance must pay the fiddler." If we are continually putting upon the Post-Office Department new burdens, giving it new duties, ramifying and extending the scope of that great Department, we must be prepared (and I say it advisedly) within the next five years to see the expenses of that Department run up to $50,000,000 a year; and it will be nobody's fault but ours.

The miscellaneous items are increased by $3,347,328—not as large as the others that I have been discussing, but yet a formidable figure. These are made up largely of three or four different estimates. For public printing and binding $374,000 increase is asked; for engraving and printing, $316,000; for surveys of public lands, $335,000; and the estimate of amounts necessary to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims is $1,600,000 more than last year. If the court is not to render judgment for these larger sums (and that can easily be told by investigation) there will be no need of appropriating this sum.

As to the survey of public lands, I believe that we can for one or two years get along without going even to the extent that we have appropriated for heretofore, and that all of this increase and more may be saved. This, then, disposes of $2,600,000 of this item of $3,300,000. We have, then, as far as estimates go, nothing formidable to contend with. We have a base-line to act on, the appropriations of last year, and in certain directions, as I have said, I believe we can still go on and reduce. I for one am desirous that the efforts at reduction should be made in the right places. I give here the tables showing the appropriations for last year and the estimates for the next year which I have been discussing:

Now the bill that to-day confronts us and is the occasion rather than the cause of what I have said is that reported by the gentleman from New Jersey, the West Point Military Academy appropriation bill. It is a bill which appropriated last year in all $322,240. It is for all the expenses of the Military Academy: its board of professors, its cadets, its current incidental expenses, and any expenses necessary for its buildings and grounds, to keep them in repair or to improve them as the needs may arise.

This academy was established by the act of March 16, 1802. It has therefore been in operation seventy-three years. It had originally by the act establishing it the Corps of Engineers as its professors. A few years subsequently, in 1812 I think, the grade of professor was created in addition to the Army engineer officers who had been. Some of these professors have been there more than forty years. They are men of high scientific attainment; they are men of celebrity in the scientific world; they have given all their strength and their life to this work; and as the result of their work and the work of their association there has graduated from that academy a corps of officers that, I venture to say, has never been surpassed in the history of the world.

This bill (and I am not going to give very much time to its discussion now, as I have certain figures and tables which I will use in the five-minute debate if I can get the floor) reduces the pay of all these professors. Now it is not within my knowledge for what exact sum a professor in the Military Academy, who has charge of the education of the young men who may be called at any moment of peril to the salvation of the country, can live for at West Point when you drive him to extremities and pinch him to the point of spending no more money than he actually needs. But I know that there are certain demands on him, certain drains upon his income, that do not apply to men elsewhere. Let me read a few words from a letter written a few days ago by one of these professors:

If you consider the pay is too large and ought to be reduced, let me beg of you to consider our positions and circumstances.

We are stationed at the loveliest spot in America and almost the most expensive; so expensive is it that last year upon applying for an officer of engineers to be assigned to duty with me the officer wrote me, begging as a favor to let him off, for he was educating a younger brother whom he would have to withdraw from school if he were ordered here, notwithstanding he would receive the increase of pay by coming here.

I assure you that when stationed in Milwaukee, receiving the pay of major, that I was better off in a pecuniary sense than I am here with that of lieutenant-colonel. Why is this? It is for the reason that we have no local markets here, everything comes from New York; that we have no educational facilities for our children, who have to be sent away to be educated; that the expense of clothing is very great, being obliged to wear the uniform, the cost of which has steadily increased; and our inability to add to our salaries by any outside work, from the peculiar nature of our duties.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope unanimous consent will be given for the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to go on.

Mr. HALE. I shall be through very shortly.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent for the gentleman to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the ruling yesterday, which was a very correct one, was that in Committee of the Whole there is no power to extend any gentleman's time.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move that the committee rise; and I will state my object——

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the Chair that the ruling of yesterday was made under a special order fixing a ten-minute rule. We are now under no such special order. When debate in Committee of the Whole has been proceeding under the hour rule, the time has frequently been extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say in response to the gentleman from Ohio that in the Committee of the Whole there is no power to change or alter the rules of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the committee rise in order to extend the time of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is hardly necessary to do that; but with the permission of the Chair I will take the floor and yield part of my time to the gentleman from Maine.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILTON] is recognized.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine ten minutes of my time.

Mr. HALE. I thank all these gentlemen for their courtesy. So much I have said for the professors. The cadets receive at present in money and rations what amounts to $608. The bill when amended reduces this allowance to $540; a reduction of $68. Not a large sum, it may be said; but if any man here has ever at any time in his life been running upon an income of six or seven hundred dollars a year, he knows that $68 makes the difference between comfort and being constantly pinched. I am told, and it will be said here of this allowance, that the cadets receive nothing of it in money except an accumulated fund for an outfit when they leave the academy. So much the more I would not touch this allowance, because if it is all doled out to them for what they need, we may be very certain not a dollar of it which they get is misspent. There is, therefore, no argument here that by cutting it off they will be kept down to necessary expenses and that if they had more they would spend or squander it in improper ways.

Mr. Chairman, these boys come from every district in the country. They come from the poor as well as from the well to do. It is to-day a possible thing for a poor man, if he has got a bright boy, and can get him into the academy, to see that boy educated on the Government allowance of $608. It is not a large sum. There are many gentlemen here before me who are having boys educated at preparatory schools and colleges, and I would be glad to have the figures made up statistically to show how many keep their boys there, either in a preparatory or college course, for $600 a year. Mr. Chairman, I for one would spare this class. I would let this allowance remain as it is. I would strike no blow, directly or indirectly, at this great military school of the country. It has furnished to us, sir, some of the greatest commanders of the present age. It has sent out a body of accomplished gentlemen and fine officers, and in the late war the luster that gathered about the achievements upon both sides was largely attributable to the influence of the Military Academy at West Point; not by any means exclusively, for I would not disparage the services of volunteer officers. But it was seen as the war progressed that we learned more and more in important commands to rely upon the educated officer who had graduated at West Point. My friends on the then other side will bear me out that their experience was in the same line. I would not strike a blow by indirection at this academy to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are one or two considerations which are pressing upon my mind. If there is any complaint among our people as to corruption among officials or as to extravagance, is it upon the question of salaries of professors at West Point, or cadets, or indeed upon salaries in general? The people have found fault with subsidies granted to railroads; they have complained of proceedings growing out of these grants of lands and money. These things have been investigated; they have been brought to light. Investigation has actually slain some men; it has lightened up the characters of others and relieved them from suspicion. This House the other day, on one of these subjects, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the law committee of the House, the last stages of the investigation into the Pacific mail subsidy. They demand all rings and fraudulent combinations about the Government shall be broken up. There must be no more Indian rings, no more whisky rings.

"Let no guilty man escape" met the public demand, and there has been no slackening of this policy on the part of the Administration. We cannot legislate too closely on these subjects. We cannot sustain and uphold the hands of the Administration too strongly to satisfy the people to this end. They complain of extravagance in public buildings, enormous structures, not needed to-day, and perhaps not in the future. They do complain and they have the right to complain on all these subjects. We can all join hands to reform and retrench and save money in these and other directions; but in the matter of salaries fixed by our Government in the different Departments I ask, Mr. Chairman, whether there is any gentleman here who believes the people complain that their public servants are paid too much? Why, sir, we had that subject before us to the great discontent of some of us two years ago, and the result of the bitter discussion on this floor then was that we settled down at last upon the basis of salaries which had been kept for years, but had been disturbed by the back-pay bill; and, unless my observation is incorrect, there has been peace upon the waters of public opinion on this question ever since. I do not mean to say that there are not some that should be reduced. There are cases where there are inordinate fees, where there are perquisites which should be cut down to a regular, fair pay. But that our officers generally are overpaid I do not believe, and I do not think that the American people believe it. There is better work for us to do than to be cutting down the salaries of professors at West Point or of the cadets or the salaries of the men in the Departments here. But I can freely join the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in his work in reducing the official force. I have no doubt that there are in many instances too large establishments kept up. There are drones in the public service who should be driven out. But our salaries to-day are small compared with those paid by other governments; they are small compared with those paid in many of the States of the Union. Our judges are not paid so well as judges in other countries or in some of the States. Our foreign ministers to-day are competing in the courts of the world with ministers who receive double and treble the pay which our representatives do. I do not believe that the people demand that we shall reduce these salaries. And I do not believe that public attention can be drawn from serious things which demand our interposition to this attempt to gain a reputation for economy by striking at cadets and professors at West Point, to be followed up, I presume, by blows at the other regular establishments.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. WHEELER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 1561) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasurer of the United States; and

The bill (H. R. No. 626) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to naturalization.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor for fifty minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I am not here, Mr. Chairman, with any set speech to assail the other side of the House for their past extravagance, or to answer the eulogies bestowed upon them by the gentleman who has just addressed the committee, for their extreme economy in the administration of the affairs of the Government. I am here, sir, simply to give some practical statements in regard to this bill now before the committee; and I think that the facts and figures will show that there is large room for retrenchment, notwithstanding that the gentleman from Maine considers that his party have been acting so long in that direction. I think, sir, that before we have gone through the various appropriation bills presented to this House it will be found that there is large scope for cutting off and retrenching extravagances of the Government.

The estimates which have been given to us from the Department of War for the support of this Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1877, are $437,470, and this bill recommends to meet those estimates an appropriation of $243,641, being $193,829 less than the estimates; and we believe, sir, that that reduction can be made without any detriment to the usefulness of that institution to any extent whatever; that it is a mere lopping off of excessive compensations and extravagant appropriations in one way and another.

The largest reductions in the expenses estimated are in the pay and allowances to the attachés and retainers at West Point. Why, sir, the Superintendent of the Military Academy receives now a compensation which I maintain makes his situation a better one pecuniarily than that of any man in this Government save the President. He receives in one way or another, directly and for longevity service, and by forage allowance, and quarters and rations, and contingent expenses, about $7,000 a year. Located at that beautiful place on the highlands of the Hudson, with all his family about him in that healthy location, he receives what is equivalent to a salary of $7,000 a year.

How does he get it? His pay proper as a colonel of the Army is $3,000. He gets a percentage of 10 per cent. for every five years, the law allowing that percentage up to twenty years. Under that rate he gets an allowance of 20 per cent., making $700 more. That makes $4,200. He gets fuel allowance, forage allowance, grain forage, hay forage, straw forage for two horses, amounting to $654.75; making $4,854. And he gets a furnished residence at the expense of the Government, worth at least $1,150; making $6,000. He gets a contingent fund of $1,000, which is entirely at his command and was given to him as an addition to his salary for the purpose of enabling him to entertain his friends. That is stated to be the object of it in the report of one of the officers of the Department—that a $1,000 contingent fund is added to his pay to enable him to entertain his friends. All this summed up makes what is equivalent to a salary of $7,000 a year, which is better than that of any Cabinet officer, who gets but $8,000 and is obliged to get a house and furnish it and live here at the seat of Government. It is far better than the pay of the Treasurer of the United States, who has under his command and control and responsibility all the Government funds, and is obliged to give large bonds, and who receives a salary of $6,500 and is obliged to live here in Washington and supply himself with a residence and to incur all the expenses incidental to living in this city. The Treasurer gets under these circumstances only $6,500 and his assistant gets $3,800.

Why, sir, the compensation of the Superintendent of the Military Academy is in excess of the compensation given to any employé or attaché of the Government, and yet we find the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in his great effort toward economy deprecating the idea of cutting down the salaries of any of these professors. Now what do we propose by the bill? We propose to allow the Superintendent his Army pay of $3,500; in addition to that to furnish him with a residence, a furnished residence, with fuel and lights, equivalent at least to $1,500, making a total compensation which this bill will give of $5,000. Then he has soldiers there at his command whom he can detail to this service and to that. The House will readily see, therefore, that this is a large compensation which we give by the bill to this officer.

Then there is the commandant of cadets. He gets by this bill $3,000 and he has a furnished residence equal to $1,500 more, with other incidentals. Now he gets over $6,000 or something like that, including his forage allowance, &c. This bill proposes to cut off all these allowances of forage, &c., and to give the Army pay with a house and residence, a furnished residence with fuel and lights, equal to $1,500.

Now, the professors that we are providing for in this bill are not Army officers. In this bill we make a distinct appropriation for so many professors—four at $3,500 a year and five at $3,000 a year These professors are not Army officers, and yet by a contrivance got through on these appropriation bills, on which are allowed to be put anything in the direction of increasing salaries and the burdens of the Government, it has been provided that the professors shall have the rank of colonel and receive the pay and all the allowances and additions which a colonel has. They therefore get grain forage, straw forage, hay forage, and all such things, running up to six or seven hundred dollars a year. They get it in an underhand way by a provision in one of these appropriation bills, providing that they shall have the pay and rank of colonel. Now we propose to cut off all these things and let the people know directly and distinctly what they are getting. We propose to give them $3,500 a year, and a furnished residence with fuel and lights equal to $1,500 a year more.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will inquire of my colleague on the committee how that salary will compare with the salaries paid to professors in the different colleges in the country?

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. There may be some colleges richly endowed, with so much money that they do not know what to do with it, that pay their professors higher salaries; but as a general rule it is a higher compensation than the ordinary colleges pay to their professors, and far better than the pay to those having positions in civil life. I understand that at Harvard University the highest pay to professors is $4,000. Now, this compensation is far better than any compensation in civil life. I have already alluded to the Treasurer. The assistant treasurer receives $3,800 a year, and he is obliged to furnish his own residence. The cashier receives $3,800. The Deputy Comptroller of the Currency gets but $3,000. Why, sir, the governor of my own State only gets $5,000 a year, without any extras, a residence or other appliance; he is obliged to find himself with a residence and to treat his friends and all that sort of thing. Sir, within a very few years our governor received only $3,000 a year. Now, we in New Jersey know nothing about these extravagant modes of living, and that is the reason the State is not in debt, or we have money enough to pay all the debts we owe. We have not been accustomed to living at Washington rates, in a high-falutin style of living. That, sir, is the old democratic way of doing things.

So much, sir, as to the pay of professors. Now we propose by this bill, in addition to a reduction of the salaries of the professors, to say that Army officers who are acting as professors or instructors at that academy shall have the same pay and allowances as they get in the Army, without any allowance of extra pay, longevity pay for longevity services, and commutations, and all that sort of thing. We propose to give them their Army pay, to provide them furnished quarters and a furnished residence, with fuel and lights; then we can understand exactly what they are getting.

Mr. HURLBUT. Did I understand the gentleman to say that officers on duty at West Point are furnished with furniture for their residences?

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. HURLBUT. Where do you get the authority for that?

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. From the gentleman who advocated the bill before the committee. He said that they had furnished residences furnished at the expense of the Government. Do you deny it?

Mr. HURLBUT. I deny that the Government lays the carpets, if that is what the gentleman means; certainly not.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Their residences are furnished, as I understand.

Mr. HURLBUT. Rooms are furnished undoubtedly, but rooms being furnished is one thing and the supply of furniture is quite another thing.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. They are furnished with furniture, and appropriations are made every year for adding to that furniture.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would like to see the authority for that.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Now, by this bill we propose that when an officer is detailed or assigned to service at West Point as professor or instructor he shall have his Army pay, not allowing him longevity pay and forage allowance, but furnishing him with a residence, fuel, and lights equal to $1,500 a year. Sir, it is a much more desirable position for an officer to occupy as an instructor at West Point than to be on active duty in the field. The places are sought for and desired because a man who obtains such a position is located at a healthy location at West Point, with his family around him, instead of being on the frontier engaged in some inglorious warfare with the Indians and liable to be picked off by a savage rifle, and besides being exposed to the elements on the frontier. It is, therefore, a much more desirable location than any other.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Maine says that they get these high salaries in order to educate their families. Why, officers on the frontier cannot educate their families there, and therefore there is no logic in that argument. Besides, there was a school provided at West Point in last year's appropriation bill, or the year before there was an appropriation of $8,000 to build a school-house for the children of soldiers and others.

The other item of this bill which I understand the gentleman antagonizes is the pay of cadets, and I ask the attention of the committee for a moment or two on that point. I should be sorry to do anything to destroy the utility of West Point. I am an advocate of that Academy and I desire to see it upheld. I had a brother who graduated at West Point, and I know something about it. I have had the honor of being one of the examiners at West Point, and I know something about the institution. When my brother was there the pay of cadets was about $28 a month, and now it is proposed to give them $45 a month; nearly double the amount formerly paid. Why, sir, this pay of cadets has been increasing year after year. As late as 1867 there was added to the pay of each cadet about $109 a year; before that time their pay had been only $500 a year. In 1837 there was added to their compensation a ration per day, equal to about thirty cents, or about $109 a year. That was added in an appropriation bill. Prior to that time the cadets experienced no difficulty in sustaining themselves upon the pay they were receiving. It is only in accordance with the extravagance of the times that this pay of cadets has been nearly doubled within a few years.

Every gentleman upon this floor who has had the privilege of recommending the appointment of a cadet at West Point knows the great strife for the place. It is so much desired that it is sought for with the greatest solicitude. Crowds of applicants assail every gentleman who has the right to recommend a cadet there. It is a very desirable position; not only insuring to the fortunate person a finished education, but it puts him eventually in the very desirable profession of an Army officer, where he will not only command a large salary and compensation, but he will be in the most successful road to distinction, to high positions of honor and dignity in this country. The Army has furnished more of our prominent public men than any other profession. Why, look at our Presidents; nearly one-half of the persons elevated to that high position were so promoted because they were successful generals. Washington, Jackson, Harrison, Pierce, Grant were all placed in that high position because they were successful generals.

It is the road to distinction. I do not wonder that the aspiring and ambitious youths of the country by scores are seeking admission to West Point. Talk about their difficulty in supporting themselves there. Why, sir, they crowd into the institution, and nobody can doubt that the academy could be filled without any charge to the country at all. But the policy and genius of our institutions lead us to throw this academy open to people of all classes without regard to their means, to open it to the youth of moderate means as well as those of ample means.

I am satisfied that the pay which we propose to give the cadets by this bill is ample and abundant. They get their board at reduced and settled rates. Their board now costs them $240 a year. That ought to be reduced; I have no doubt that it is in excess of what ought to be paid. But they are now charged $240 a year for board, and the excess of $300 provided by this bill is left to supply them with their ordinary clothing and other expenses.

I submit, therefore, that the objections which have been urged here are not well founded. Some material deductions have been made in other parts of this bill; but as no question has been raised as to the propriety of these reductions, I do not know that it is necessary for me to suggest what they are or to show the propriety of them. For instance, in the paragraph beginning with line 36 of the printed bill for repairs and improvements, &c., is an item which heretofore has been in round numbers $22,500 for several years back. We have reduced that item to $12,000. It is for general repairs. I find, after calling upon the Department for a specification of the manner in which it has been expended, that it has been mainly used in building up new houses and edifices, and not at all in the way of general repairs. And I have no doubt they would expend a hundred thousand dollars a year in the same way if you would give it to them.

I do not know that we are under any obligation to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] nor to his friends on that side of the House for the opportunity to bring these matters before the House and before this committee. As soon as this bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] reserved all points of order on it; and under the rules of the House, as they then stood, if that gentleman had interposed any objection, we could not have gone on a single step in the way of reduction or retrenchment in this bill. We would have been compelled to make the bill conform to existing laws and could introduce no proposition however desirable for the reduction of expenditures. Heretofore the whole system of legislation through appropriation bills has been to leave the way entirely open for an increase and multiplication of expenses and salaries, and you could not retrench in any way whatever. It is due to the majority of this House that the road is now open, and it is now in the judgment and good discretion of this side of the House to say how far that road shall be traveled.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to present some of my views on this bill, and to claim some attention from this committee for two reasons: first, that by law this West Point Academy is a part of the Army organization of the United States, and I happen to be a member of the committee whose duty it is to look after the interests of that branch of the public service; secondly, it pleased the House last year to appoint me one of the Board of Visitors at West Point, and I come to the consideration of this question with much fresher recollections than does my venerable friend from New Jersey, [Mr. HAMILTON,] who, I apprehend, visited that institution about the time his brother was there and receiving $28 a month. Before I leave that point, allow me to suggest to the gentleman that, at the time that distinguished brother of his was a cadet at West Point and receiving $28 a month, the economy of this country put the pay of members of Congress at $8 per day for each day of their attendance upon its sessions. And I expect to see the gentleman follow up his economy by remitting to the Treasury of the United States all his pay over and above that amount.

Now, sir, this bill in my judgment strikes deliberately, willfully, and ignorantly at the well-being of a great national institution whose record is clear to every man in this House; for, sir, as my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] has said, this Military Academy furnished to us on both sides in the late war the best men we had. It gave to us who stood by the Union at that time, Grant and Sherman and Thomas and Sheridan; it gave to our antagonists at the South the vast advantage of the great training of Lee and Longstreet and Stonewall Jackson. You can not make a sectional question out of the Military Academy.

The question which I desire to present to this House is whether this academy shall be maintained on that proper, liberal, benign footing which its own importance demands and which the dignity of this nation requires. I have been astounded at some of the propositions presented in this bill, propositions which I will endeavor to demonstrate could be the result of nothing but a bastard and blundering economy. The bill shows on its very face that the committee who were in charge of it knew nothing of the organization or the needs of the Military Academy or the law appertaining to its constitution; that they do not even know how many cadets there are there, nor how many they ought to provide for; that they have undertaken to strike with one blow—one awkward, left-handed, cowardly blow—at the body of young men whom the nation through its Representatives selects to be educated there, not for their benefit, but for ours; while another blow is aimed at the men who by long and diligent service are, under a provision which has stood as long as the Government itself, entitled to the advantages of this "longevity" rule, although the Committee on Appropriations do not seem to know what it means.

I have never been educated at West Point; I have had no brothers educated there nor any of my kin. I have personally no direct interest in this measure; but standing here as a man who during the last fifteen years has seen something of the needs of the country, as a man whose entire military service was in the volunteer ranks, I affirm that there is no institution in the country which gentlemen have need to be more careful of interfering with than the West Point Military Academy. There was a time when it might have been considered popular to attack it; that time has passed. There was a time when it was considered popular to attack the Army, (and I gather from indications here that that is to be the next step,) but that time, gentlemen, is past. Both institutions are rooted and grounded in the faith and belief of the American people in their efficiency and value. Any attempt to cripple or curtail either will damn to perpetual oblivion the men or the party undertaking it.

Among the very first items that appear in this bill is an appropriation for 310 cadets. Now there are 342 cadets. The number on the 1st day of last September was 314; and it is not safe to average them at any lower number than 315 to 320. So the bill fails to provide for the proper number of those who are to be the recipients of the benefits of that academy. Then take another attempt to reduce. These gentlemen have saved to the cadets the ration; they have appropriated for 310 cadets at $450 each a year and a ration; but they provide no money to buy that ration with. They have got to add about $32,900 to their own bill in order to commute this ration and give to the cadets the advantage which they propose to give them. The ration is commuted, and has been for years, at thirty cents; and the money goes to the general maintenance and support of the body.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HURLBUT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the gentleman observed that in the estimates 310 cadets are estimated for?

Mr. HURLBUT. I did see that in the estimates; and I also know that your committee has been notified that that is an error of the Paymaster-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. The appropriations are of course to be made for the full number; there is no question about that; and the pay is to be fixed at $540 per annum for the requisite number.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, if he will allow me, that the Department estimates for only 310 cadets.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am aware of that.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. And the Department further states that that is the average number of those that are there.

Mr. HURLBUT. That is a mistake.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. It is stated that a large portion of the cadets do not attend regularly, do not pass their examinations; that on the average that is the whole number there. So that the gentleman will find we know something about this question as well as he.

Mr. HURLBUT. Well, sir, I will convince the gentleman in a few moments that what I assert is strictly correct. There has been laid before the gentleman's committee a statement that the estimate of 310 cadets is an error on the part of the Paymaster-General. There is a statement now before me from the adjutant of that academy, a very gallant gentleman from my own district, that the number of cadets on the 1st day of last September was 315; and he states, I state, everybody will state who has had opportunities of knowledge, that it is not safe to estimate for any less number than that.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. The number I have given is all that was estimated for last year.

Mr. HURLBUT. Yes, sir; but last year it so happened that a very superb class of young men went in there, and, instead of there being the usual large average of loss at the second examination, the number remaining after that examination was far beyond the average, a fact which gentlemen who undertake to meddle with that institution ought to know.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. It is a pity the gentleman was not on the committee himself.

Mr. HURLBUT. I dislike to legislate for the whole United States, but I have been put upon one committee charged with that duty already.

I call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey who reported this bill to the fact that, while they have allowed 310 cadets $450 a year each and one ration, they have not appropriated the money in this bill to commute that ration. Is not that statement correct?

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. By the act of 1867 this ration was for the first time added. Before then no ration was given.

Mr. HURLBUT. That is not answering my question. Have you provided for commuting that rations of these cadets?

Mr. HAMILTON of New Jersey. We propose by amendment what has been stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HURLBUT. When the amendment comes up we will talk about it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. The gentleman from Maine stated that with commutation of ration we proposed to make the pay of the cadets $540 and to strike out the ration.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am only speaking of the bill as I find it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. The gentleman from Maine stated what it would be.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is not here among the other items.

It is easy, Mr. Chairman, to get up the idea of economy in this country; nothing is easier, for all you have to do, where a permanent and valuable improvement has been begun, which will cost money to carry it on, which, however, is permanent in its character, and for a hundred years will be of value, all you have to do, I say, is to cut it off. These gentlemen have done that. The Government of the United States expended between sixty and seventy thousand dollars for the erection of a hospital building at West Point. I state from my own personal inspection, as well as from the report of every surgical and medical officer attending there, as well as from the report of every Board of Visitors for the last ten years, that the present hospital at West Point is a disgrace to the smallest garrison in the country. With an average of three hundred and ten to three hundred and twenty cadets, the hope and choice of this Union, they can put but twelve beds in that old dilapidated rookery, which has stood for the last forty years, and is now absolutely unfit both in situation and equipment for the purpose for which it is used. Now the Government has gone on under this same wasteful administration, I suppose the gentleman will call it, and expended an amount there I am told of about sixty or seventy thousand dollars for the erection of a hospital in a good place, with all the improvements belonging to the advancement of modern science. That building stands there at West Point ready for roofing. The Department calls for $42,000 to finish it and to make it fit for occupancy by the cadets. The economist from New Jersey, however, strikes it all out.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him by saying that we have not yet reported upon that part of the bill?

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir; you struck it out.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. We referred it to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HURLBUT. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have nothing to do with it, and the gentleman from New Jersey knows it. It is strictly and solely within the control of his committee and should be appropriated for under this Military Academy bill. When they struck it out they were guilty of a moral cowardice which stamps with reprobation all their pretense of reform.

Now, sir, the gentleman has talked here about cutting down the commandant. He has found an old law which provides that whenever a man is ordered as superintendent at West Point he shall, no matter what his rank is in the Army, receive the pay and allowance of a colonel. Of course, if he is a colonel already in the Army he gets the pay and allowance belonging to that rank. I do not know whether they know that my friend, Colonel Ruger, is a colonel in the Army now, who has honorably worked his way from West Point to his present position; and I deny the right of the Committee on Appropriations by any indirection to single out that officer, who by the Army law as it now stands is entitled to receive $3,500 as colonel and $1,000 for his longevity ration, and cut him down to $3,500 a year. I deny it.

The same thing is true in regard to the commandant of cadets. He is a lieutenant-colonel in the Army and is entitled to his longevity ration. He is entitled to his pay under the law of the land, independent of his position as an officer at West Point, and also to the allowance which these gentlemen attempt to cut off by this indirection.

There was another thing I understood the gentleman to speak of, and it came with a great deal of flourish of trumpets, that the committee propose to strike down this system of longevity rations. Mr. Chairman, what is it? If I understand what has been meant by the advocates of civil-service reform, it is that a man having once acquired a position, honestly filling it and discharging its duties, he is entitled to remain there, not only undisturbed and unharassed, but promoted in rank or pay according to the kind of service he renders. That is genuine reform. That is the principle which has prevailed in the Army in regard to Army officers. All officers below the rank of brigadier general are entitled to longevity allowance of 10 per cent. for every five years of continuous faithful service until the amount reaches 40 per cent.

There is a distinct, positive law that in no case shall the pay of a colonel go beyond $4,500 or the pay of a lieutenant-colonel exceed $4,000. So, too—I do not know what to call it; I do not wish to go beyond the limits of proper phraseology in this debate; but I cannot understand, for the soul of me, what gentlemen on this Committee on Appropriations mean by translating the phrase that the Government furnishes these men quarters into saying that they get their rooms and parlors, with all the comfortable surroundings of life. The Government gives them the bare rooms, as in a garrison, and nothing else, and it is precisely under the same law and it is precisely the same quarters that we give to an officer of the Army on any frontier garrison post.

I have before me a table carefully prepared, accurate in every particular, showing the exact amount of all pay and allowances that every man receives at the Military Academy under the present system. Army officers serving at West Point are now by law, whatever may be their rank, entitled to additional pay, because of the additional expensiveness of the place. And while I am upon that, I will say two or three words in which I have no doubt the experience of every gentleman who knows anything about West Point will sustain me. West Point for all practical purposes is an isolated place. There is no back country to speak of. All supplies to it come from Albany or New York by the boats, and in winter when the Hudson is closed by ice it is difficult to get there. And I can say by inspection of the accounts of the purveyor, of his supplies to the cadets for their mess last summer, that there is no place within my knowledge so expensive to maintain a family or to feed any given number of individuals in this country. If there be such a place I do not know of it.

Again, officers who are assigned from the Army to West Point are compelled by necessity to incur more than ordinary expenses. That glorious river, sir, which runs down by West Point is the avenue of a vast travel. This corps of cadets, with their unrivaled precision in maneuver and accuracy in drill, together with the beauty of the place, draw constantly there a crowd of people not only of the ordinary visitors among the tourists of our own country, but there is not a man of any military reputation in Europe or any military rank in Europe who when he comes to this country does not make it almost his first business to visit and examine the state of things at West Point. In addition to that, these gentlemen who are in charge are compelled, as an example to the young men who are under their control, to be always in the most accurate and apple-pie order. And I suppose the gentleman from New Jersey thinks that that is a very useless extravagance, because I have no doubt he considers that a man can do that duty just as well in a blouse as in anything else; and the only thing that surprises me is that the committee had not noticed that the corps of graduates every day exhibits unblushingly to the world an audacious instance of extravagance in having three rows of buttons on the breasts of their coats, when everybody in New Jersey and elsewhere knows that one row of buttons answers for buttoning a coat. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I think all these things are reasons why the men who are detailed there at West Point to act as instructors and assistant professors should have an addition to their pay in order to enable them to exhibit themselves properly before their command and to be clear from uneasiness in regard to monetary matters. But, sir, the greatest iniquity in the whole bill, in my judgment, is the application of this rule to the professors. There is one gentleman there who for forty-seven years has been professor of mathematics in this institution, and who is admitted on all hands to be among the very highest scientific authorities and to have a most singular faculty of communicating the knowledge which is in him. That gentleman by this long continuance in service, by this diligence in well-doing, I suppose is entitled to receive $4,500. But this committee, which has the whole interest of the United States committed to their charge, cannot by possibility be expected to know the several needs which they are acting upon specifically; and so when they undertake in their bill to modify the well-considered language of previous bills and to say that there shall be four professors who shall have the pay of $3,500 a year, and five professors who shall have the pay of $3,000, I wish some intelligent gentleman on that committee to tell me which of them is to get the one sum and which the other. They have struck out the longevity provision. How are you going to divide it out? Which gentleman is to have $3,500 and which $3,000? You have left no way by which you can estimate it. Formerly it was estimated under the law. A professor of a certain number of years' standing became a colonel, and was entitled to a colonel's pay and longevity; and those below it were lieutenant-colonels, and entitled to get a lieutenant-colonel's pay and longevity. But this bill provides not by name for paying particular men, but provides four professors at $3,500 and five at $3,000. And it is not within possibility to tell, of all the professors of mathematics in this country, which are the $3,500 and which are the $3,000 men.

Sir, the gentleman talks about rations and forage. Now, if he knows anything at all about the law, he knows that all these late abuses which had accumulated through the industry of persons looking after their own interests and had been got up in order to evade the law had been long ago abolished. He knows that no man gets commutation for forage except in kind. He must know that there is no commutation for forage at all, nor can any man in the Army now receive commutation for forage and quarters except in kind. He must also report upon his honor that he does use the residence and feed the animals which are to be fed at the public expense.

There is another thing and infinitely bad case so wholly undeserved that I cannot help addressing myself to it now. I understood the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILTON] to say that these gentlemen at West Point, having the disposition and disbursement of the public money, diverted the money appropriated for particular purposes by law to purposes not contemplated by law. I understood him to say that if $100,000 were appropriated for a hospital, a large amount of that would be spent in riotous living and fine quarters. Sir, that is a scandalous charge and wholly unsupported by the least scintilla of proof.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. HURLBUT. I am always willing to be corrected when I am in error.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I made no such statement as he has stated whatever. I said that they had appropriated money for the erection of permanent edifices when the appropriation was made for repairs. I did not say at all that there was any riotous living.

Mr. HURLBUT. I undertake to say, without knowing anything about it specifically, but on my particular knowledge of the character and honor of the men at West Point, that no appropriation ever made for the support of the Military Academy at West Point has ever been diverted from the purposes to which Congress appropriated it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these professors and instructors do not get forage allowance?

Mr. HURLBUT. I said that they received forage in kind.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. They receive straw forage, grain forage, and hay forage?

Mr. HURLBUT. Why, I told you what the law now is. I have been trying to teach you that little thing for a long while.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Ah, have you?

Mr. HURLBUT. And what is more, I wish the gentleman to understand what I do say, and I say that no man in the Army, at the West Point Academy or wherever else he may be, can receive anything in the shape of commutation for quarters or forage; that whenever the officer does receive forage he receives it in kind and is obliged to certify on his honor that it is for horses he is entitled to have by law for the public service. I hope the gentleman now understands that.

But, sir, there was one thing that was unkind and ungracious in the speech of the gentleman. The gentleman said that there was an appropriation of money given by Congress which the Committee on Appropriations had cut down as extra emolument to the Superintendent of the Military Academy in order that he might waste it upon his friends. Sir, Colonel Thomas H. Ruger, who is now the Superintendent of the Military Academy, receives as colonel of the Army $3,500 salary, and under the law $1,000 for contingencies, making the total $4,500; and that is all the money that the Government pays to Colonel Ruger. It would be due to him if he served on the frontier or anywhere else. There has been in years past an allowance made to the Superintendent of the Military Academy of a contingent fund to be administered in his discretion, not for the reception of his friends, but for the proper and legitimate entertainment of the distinguished persons visiting West Point, largely from the city of New York, although some may be from its suburb, New Jersey, who go there no doubt. [Laughter.] And, sir, I say that the statement that any officer who has ever held that situation has used these funds for his private emolument is unkind, ungenerous, and ungracious.

Mr. BLAINE. And untrue.

Mr. HURLBUT. That might hardly be parliamentary. Now, I call the attention of gentlemen, before I leave this question of extra pay, to this proposition: An officer of the Army who is found singularly qualified to act as professor is withdrawn from the Army and placed there as a professor because the policy of that institution has always been like that of all other teaching institutions, to take from its own alumni its best men to be assigned as professors and instructors. It is self-preservation. The letter read by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] was written, I know, by a very distinguished officer in the engineer service; he was called from the ranks of the Army; he goes in there as professor. Now, cannot the gentleman from New Jersey see that any officer who takes the position of professor at West Point and quits the Army loses the opportunity of promotion? He devotes himself to science and teaching for the rest of his life. He has no opportunity for gaining those magnificent prizes which the gentleman from New Jersey speaks of. He can be no competitor for the presidential or any other chair. He devotes himself for the rest of his life to the education of those who are in future not only to defend our country, but who are to be in charge of all the great works, of the vast operations of internal improvements, and of our harbors, of all our proposed canals, and all the great works of that kind; they are all being carried on and conducted by men educated at that institution.

Now, sir, the merely civil benefits that it gives to them, the civil benefits which these gentlemen receive are permanent positions, and the promise made by the United States when they took those places, made under the most solemn form of law, that, if they did remain there and did perform their duty well, their pay should be enhanced in order to compensate them for the loss of promotion in the line of service which they had left.

Now, I look upon this as among the contracts of the United States. I say that when you induce a man by such promises as these to leave the active service of the Army in which he is sure of promotion and of increased pay, and set him down for life in the greater but more quiet avocation of a teacher of youth, the nation has pledged its faith, and it is unsound economy and equally unsound policy for the nation to break that contract. It strikes at faith, and I am glad that the proposition comes just from where it does come. God forbid that any man who has ever borne arms on either side should place himself here in a position to belittle these men, to break up the calculations of a life-time, and to disturb the honorable belief which they had a right to have in the promises of their Government.

I speak of this thing now because coming events cast their shadows before them. This little, temporary, small, ill-considered, ignorant attack upon West Point is only the preliminary, the mere skirmisher in the main movement to be directed against that great institution of the nation for which West Point is the nursery, the Army of the United States. I tell gentlemen once more, and I wish them to bear this in mind, that they cannot excite among the intelligent people of this nation any jealousy of the Regular Army. We plain people who live out West know that one-third of the Regular Army is officered by men from West Point; the other two-thirds is officered by men who have never passed through that institution, but who won their promotion in that school of soldiers, perhaps better than any other, the actual scenes of conflict and duty.

I have not time now nor have I any desire to detain the committee longer by any extended remarks. I state simply that these great permanent appropriations, the appropriation for the hospital, the appropriation for the sewerage of the post, which is recommended by everybody that has ever been there, in order to maintain the health and keep up the sanitary condition of the post, for which this sewerage is absolutely required, these items are struck out of this bill, and are all of them of that character of permanent works or of permanent appropriations for longevity and other pay to which the honor of the Government is pledged. The other reductions I do not intend to deal with in detail now. They will come up as the several paragraphs of this bill are reached for amendment, and will be noticed by others.

I stand up here now in my place only to say that whatever may be the case in the State of New Jersey, the people in my section of the country are not so cursedly poor that they want to break down the calculations of the skilled soldier, and in so doing to break down and violate the plighted faith of the nation.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, for at least five years I have claimed to be and aimed to be a devoted ally of whomsoever has sought to diminish municipal, State, or national expenditures. I have believed that there was a great want of economy in respect to all these great interests. But it is impossible for me to advocate or to do otherwise than oppose the proposed economy at West Point.

I rise now mainly to make one statement with reference to the pay of cadets. I understand that prior to the war, when we had $200,000,000 of paper money instead of $700,000,000 as now, the amount furnished by the Government to each cadet was equivalent to $500 per year; he now receives $608. I suggest to gentlemen on the other side of the House that the first thing for them to do is to improve their currency. Yet, if anything can be told from the indications here of the sentiments of a majority of this House, there is not a majority here who are in favor of making our currency respectable at any fixed time whatever. Now, I say that if in the face of that, and in connection with that, the gentlemen who are responsible for this matter shall cut down the compensation and pay of the cadets at West Point from $608 to $540 a year, when you now have $700,000,000 of currency and every material interest of the country is suffering and languishing, that will be economy which will return to plague its inventors.

Mr. RANDALL obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. COX, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer a resolution of inquiry.

MANY MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the question is upon the motion to adjourn. Before submitting that motion the Chair will submit the requests of two members for leave of absence.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, was granted leave of absence from Friday next until Monday evening following, on account of pressing business.

Mr. HYMAN was granted leave of absence until the 2d of February.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Cincinnati, urging the members of Congress from Cincinnati to support the centennial appropriation, to the Committee on the Centennial.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 27, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the petition of M. D. Nickles and 374 other citizens of Minnesota and Dakota, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Red River of the North. I beg to submit with the petition, and ask to have printed in the RECORD with it, a brief statement of the increase of business on that river within the last year, and the communication accompanying the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the papers printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petition of the undersigned, residents of Clay County, Minnesota, and Cass County, Dakota Territory, respectfully represents that in consequence of the present state of Goose Rapids the navigation of the Red River of the North is greatly impeded and during a portion of the season of navigation entirely stopped above the rapids; that it is necessary for the successful navigation of said Red River that said rapids be improved, it being a public necessity and absolutely essential to the prosperity of the towns and villages of the district of the Red River Valley, and that the traffic on said river is rapidly increasing, but owing to the impediment of said rapids navigation is greatly hindered, to the detriment of said district.

Therefore your petitioners respectfully and earnestly pray that an appropriation may be made in aid of the improvement of said Red River so as to remove the said impediment complained of.

And your petitioners will, as in duty bound, ever pray.

Dated at MOORHEAD, CLAY COUNTY, MINNESOTA, January 5, 1876.

The accompanying statements are as follows:

Statement of tonnage on Red River during the season of 1875.

	Tons.
Merchandise in bond	5,275.270
Merchandise, American	22,168.259

First class	2,098
Second class	3,544
		5,642
Going south:
First class	1,020
Second class	1,034
		2,054
Total number of passengers		7,696

NOTE.—The above includes adults only. Fifty per cent. might be added for children.

Letter to the chairman of the Committee on Transportation.

DEAR SIR: In view of the rapid increase in population and commercial importance of the Red River Valley, including the Province of Manitoba and the northwestern territory tributary thereto, your attention is called to the great importance of an early appropriation by Congress for the improvement of the Red River, it being the natural highway for travel and international communication between the United States and Manitoba and all that portion of the British possessions west and northwest of the same as the link connecting the railroad system of Minnesota, terminating at Breckinridge and Moorhead with Winnipeg, which is the chief commercial port of Manitoba and the distributing point for the entire trade of the British possessions in the northwest.

As an evidence of the increasing trade on the Red River you are referred to the rapid and substantial growth of Winnipeg, situated at the northern extremity of the same, near where it flows into Lake Winnipeg, which has increased during the past three years from a population of but a few hundred to more than five thousand souls; and while in 1870 one steamboat only was engaged in the navigation of the Red River, accomplishing the entire business of the river in two or three trips, during the season of 1875 seven steamboats with ten barges have been engaged the entire season, making from twelve to nineteen trips each.

For more definite information as to the traffic on the river during the season just closed (1875) you are referred to the statement of tonnage hereto annexed; also, statement of number of passengers carried. It will be seen that the freight transported by steamboats aggregates 17,714 tons of all classes as against 8,900 transported by steamboats during the season of 1874, an increase of about 100 per cent. The remaining tonnage that was transported in flat-boats, consisting mostly of flour, grain, feed, pork, provisions, and lumber, is given only in part, as no correct or reliable data are at hand from which to calculate; but a corresponding increase of this portion of the river transportation would swell the aggregate to between twenty and twenty-five thousand tons. Of passengers, also, the accompanying statement does not make a full exhibit of the passenger traffic of the Red River Valley, as by reason of great delay consequent upon the difficulties of navigation during low water large numbers of passengers have traveled by stage and other land conveyances.

With the present prospects of a rapid increase in population by means of both Canadian and foreign immigration into Manitoba there is every reason to expect a corresponding percentage of increase of transportation on the Red River each succeeding year; and, as will be seen by the statement, more than four-fifths of all the commodities transported are exports from the United States into Manitoba, a large portion of which are furnished directly by the merchants, manufacturers, and producers of Minnesota.

Colonel Farquhar has given in his report, dated March 4, 1874, the general character of the stream, with detailed estimate of cost of improvement between Moorhead and Frog Point, covering a distance of about one hundred and twenty-five miles, including Goose Rapids. It is proper, however, to add that the portion of this river now used for navigation, to wit, between Moorhead and Winnipeg, runs for about three hundred and fifty miles through United States territory and one hundred and fifty miles through Canadian territory, and the Dominion government have already made an appropriation for the improvement of that portion lying within their own territory, and are prepared to expend the same as soon as it can be utilized by a corresponding improvement of that portion lying within the United States.

It will be seen by Colonel Farquhar's report that $22,000 is the estimated cost of the improvement of that portion of the river included in his survey, to wit, between Moorhead and Frog Point, including Goose Rapids. It is suggested, however, that, if Congress is now unwilling to make so large an appropriation, more immediate and practical results could be realized with a smaller appropriation, by beginning at the northern boundary-line, (Pembina,) where the improvements made by the Dominion government would terminate, and working up the river, (south,) thus rendering the improved portion of the river continuous from Winnipeg as far south in our own territory as the means appropriated by Congress would enable the improvements to extend. In fact it is believed that an appropriation of $40,000 would go far toward, if not entirely complete, such improvements as would insure a depth of not less than four feet in the channel between Pembina and Frog Point at the lowest stage of water.

The immediate advantages of this improvement can hardly be estimated, not only to our own State in the increased facilities for transportation to its present and future inhabitants, as well as those of Dakota in the Red River Valley, but by the greatly augmented exports from this country to the Province of Manitoba and the territory beyond, combined with the continually increasing freight and passenger traffic between the old and new provinces of Canada, which must necessarily pass through our territory.

Another soon-to-be-important item of trade on the Red River, which now makes no figure whatever, is the transportation to eastern markets of the large surplus of grain which must in a few years be produced by the rich soil lying along the Red River Valley its entire length, and for the cultivation and development of which no one thing could add a greater impetus than cheap transportation consequent upon the improvement of navigation of the Red River.

The importance of immediate action by the United States Government is made more apparent by the fact that the Dominion government are pushing forward with vigor that portion of the Central Pacific Railroad east of the Red River, connecting that stream near Winnipeg with Lake Superior at Thunder Bay, this branch of that road being now under process of rapid construction from both its eastern and western extremities. It is believed, however, that with an improved navigation in the Red River the route through the United States will always be able to successfully compete for the carrying trade between the Canadian Provinces.

I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,

N. W. KITTSON.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Chairman Committee on Transportation United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PADDOCK. I present a petition signed by 100 chiefs and headmen of the Otoe tribe of Indians, in Nebraska, asking for the sale of their entire reservation and their own removal farther south. A bill authorizing such sale and removal is now in the hands of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I move the reference of this petition to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. I also present a petition signed by 3,000 citizens of Utah Territory, asking Congress to make an appropriation in aid of the centennial exhibition to be held at Philadelphia the present year. These people are mainly the hewers of wood and drawers of water for a religious hierarchy there existing, but they are a temperate, frugal, industrious, Union-loving people. They have brought down the mountain streams through irrigating channels and transformed a desert into a garden. Their petition is worthy of full consideration by Congress. I move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH presented the petition of H. Killam & Co. and other citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, praying that the Government issue at par fifty-year gold bonds with gold interest at 3.65 per cent. per annum, and convertible at all times into greenbacks within the limits of such amount as may remain in the Treasury, wherein a reserve of seventy-five millions of greenbacks shall ordinarily be kept for the purpose of said conversion; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DORSEY presented a memorial of 200 citizens of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, remonstrating against the establishment of a United States court in the Indian Territory, which would endanger life and property on account of the incompetency of juries; which was referred to the Committee on the Judicary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Andrew B. Battelle and George D. Evans, praying compensation for beef furnished to the United States Army under a contract in the year 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMILTON. I present the memorial of the respective delegations, here at Washington, of the Cherokee, Creek, Seminole, and Choctaw Nations of Indians, asking the repeal of the following-named acts as making conditional grants of land of the United States out of the Indian Territory to railroad companies, namely: "An act granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad and its extension to Red River;" "An act granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of a southern branch of the Union Pacific Railway and Telegraph from Fort Riley, Kansas, to Fort Smith, Arkansas;" and "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast." I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Territories and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Isaac Wood, W. S. Hawkins, and other citizens of Fairhaven, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Jacob W. Seaver and other citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of the two-cent United States stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia, relating to the improvement of the Ohio River and its tributaries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, in favor of an appropriation by the Federal Government for the repair of the turnpike from Fairmount to Gauley Bridge; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, relating to the sale of leaf-tobacco as affected by the provisions of the revenue law of the United States enacted June 6, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, requesting her representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to secure an appropriation sufficient to continue the improvement of the Monongahela River to its head; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, relating to the erection of a monument near the junction of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers at Point Pleasant, in Mason County, to commemorate the battle of Point Pleasant, fought October 10, 1774; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, in favor of aid by Congress to improve the navigation of Elk River in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented a petition of envelope manufacturers, stationers, and printers, praying a discontinuance of the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PATTERSON presented the petition of P. A. Ahl & Brother, of Newville, Pennsylvania, praying compensation for property appropriated and used by the United States authorities in 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present the petition of 46 persons, whose residences are not indicated in the petition, praying for the repeal of the two-cent check-stamp tax, and I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying Congress to aid the Texas Pacific Railway Company by a guarantee of the interest on its bonds; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have in my hand a report which was made by the chief clerk of the Treasury Department to the Secretary of the Treasury December 15, 1872, which contains an analytical statement of the system of accounting in the Treasury, with a statement also of what are deemed by him to be erroneous practices that had grown up in the Treasury Department, authorized by law or tolerated by long usage and made a part of the system. Accompanying this was a bill which was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and submitted in that year to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, and, as I recollect, approved by that committee and reported to the House for the purpose of amending all these erroneous practices. It was adopted by the House, I am told, and lost or not considered in the Senate. This document was printed for the use of the Treasury and only a small number of copies issued. I can find only one copy. I think it of sufficient importance to justify me in asking the Senate to order the printing of it in the RECORD, that it may be at the service of the members of the Senate and others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to having the paper printed in the RECORD?

Mr. DAVIS. I did not understand what it was. Let the Clerk read the title of it.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A report to the Secretary of the Treasury on a bill to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes in relation to estimates of appropriations and public accounts, by the chief clerk of the Treasury Department."

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to its being printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

The document is as follows:

Report to the Secretary of the Treasury on a bill "to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes in relation to estimates, appropriations, and public accounts," by the chief clerk of the Treasury Department.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1872.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the draught of a bill to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes in relation to estimates, appropriations, and public accounts, prepared in compliance with your instructions, and to offer the following explanation of its various provisions:

PRELIMINARY.

Very soon after the present administration of the Treasury Department began it was found that the system of business then in use was susceptible of great simplification and improvement, and a determined effort was made with this end in view. One of the first steps in this direction was to improve and simplify the Book of Estimates, in relation to which many complaints were made by the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations. The result of this effort was a complete revision and re-arrangement of this book, conforming it, as nearly as practicable, to the law as it then was. This revised book was submitted to Congress on the first day of the session, commencing December 6, 1869.

The committees of both Houses very warmly commended and approved the work, and fully indorsed the changes, which had been made with a view to simplicity and uniformity, although much of it was necessarily done without authority of law, which was found to be very incomplete and unsatisfactory.

The difficulties and annoyances which were met with at every step suggested the propriety of preparing a law in relation to the subject which would place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury sufficient authority to do the work properly, and at the same time would lay down certain statutory rules in regard to the manner in which it should be done, that would result in a book alike creditable to the Department charged with its preparation, and serviceable and convenient to the Committees on Appropriations.

The Secretary, therefore, directed the preparation of a bill, to be submitted to Congress on this subject, which should embody the practice of the Government in relation to this book, so far as it had been found from practical experience to work satisfactorily and harmoniously. Accordingly a bill was prepared and submitted toward the close of the last session of the Forty-first Congress, but, owing to the pressure of other business, and the nearness of the close of the session, it was not acted upon.

On the 4th of March, 1871, the succeeding Congress assembled, and on the 14th of the same month Mr. DAWES, the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations in the preceding Congress, by unanimous consent, introduced the bill (H. R. No. 178) and, after some discussion and a reading of an explanation of the objects of the bill, which had been prepared at the request of Mr. Beck, it was passed by the House without opposition or amendment. In the Senate the bill was not reached, although effort was made to obtain a hearing from the Committee on Appropriations in relation to it. Up to this time it has not been acted upon in that body. Since the organization of the present Committees on Appropriations their experience has been, in a measure, similar to that of all preceding ones, and they can fully appreciate the necessity for better and more complete legislation on the subject referred to.

The bill now submitted has been carefully prepared, and every section of it has been considered by the gentlemen of this Department most competent to advise as to its form and effect. The whole subject has been very carefully studied, and I am prepared to offer the bill in its present shape as entirely worthy of your favorable recommendation to Congress. The only object which has governed in the preparation of the bill has been a sincere desire to improve the system of business in relation to estimates, appropriations, and public accounts, and there is no provision contained in it which has not been the subject of the severest scrutiny, as well as the most careful comparison with the laws now upon the statute-books and the practice of the several Departments under them. In addition to the light of over ten years' practical experience in the business of the Government, I have availed myself of numerous suggestions from Representatives and Senators, as well as from officers of the various Departments, which have been received and carefully weighed, and whenever the suggestions were practical they have been adopted. Among others, Mr. EDMUNDS, of the Senate committee, to whom was referred the original bill, has furnished many valuable suggestions, most of which have been embodied in this new draught. I feel confident, therefore, that, in submitting the bill in its present shape, I offer to Congress as worthy and important a measure as can occupy its time during the present session.

The value of many of its provisions can only be fully understood by those who are constantly engaged on the work which it is intended to simplify and improve. At the same time, it has been my constant aim to produce a law as free from technicalities as the subject would permit, so that those least familiar with the work of which it treats would be able to act upon it intelligently.

I invite your attention to the following brief explanation of the details of the bill:

"SEC. 1. That all estimates and communications asking for appropriations for any branch of the Government shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury."

The requirements of this section are substantially the same as those resulting from the practical construction of the resolution of January 7, 1846, under which the estimates are now submitted. The importance of requiring all estimates to be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury would seem to be manifest, from the fact that he is by law charged with the duty of managing the finances of the Government, as well as of reporting to Congress the estimates of the revenues and expenditures. It is impossible for him to obtain accurate and reliable information concerning the needs, in this particular, of the other Executive Departments, unless their estimates are sent to him. It has been the practice to do this almost ever since the organization of the Government, and it is one entirely satisfactory to all departments of the service. By charging one single officer with the duty, a uniform and condensed single document is obtained, covering the whole ground of estimated expenditures, and saving no end of time and trouble to Congress.

"SEC. 2. That the said Secretary shall cause to be prepared blank forms for estimates, so arranged as to exhibit, in a uniform, simple, and comprehensive manner, the general object for which the appropriation is asked; the specific objects of expenditure in detail; the total amount required under each general head; the date of the act or resolution authorizing, or of the treaty stipulating for, the expenditure, with references to the volume, page, and section or article of the statutes where the same may be found; and the amount appropriated for the preceding year: Provided, That where an item of expenditure is only authorized by reason of an appropriation having been previously made therefor, in lieu of the date thereof, the word 'appropriated' shall be inserted."

The primary provision of this section, requiring the preparation of blanks, is absolutely necessary to secure a proper uniformity in the estimates submitted by the various Departments. This, however, was never done until the commencement of the present administration of this Department, and at first was not appreciated by the other Executive Departments, but it has been found to work so admirably and to save so much time and labor that nearly or quite all of them now urge its continuance. The second provision, which indicates the form in which the estimates shall be prepared, is a matter of very considerable moment, because it designates the kinds of information to be furnished in the main portion of the work, and as a general rule. An examination of the pages of the estimates submitted to Congress at the present session will discover that they conform exactly to the provisions of this section. It has been suggested that other and more extensive information should be included in these pages; but in all such work it must be borne in mind that there is a practical limit to the amount of matter which can be put upon a printed page of convenient size for constant use. The book, as printed for the present session, (quarto,) is as large as can conveniently be handled, and the type in which it is printed (brevier) is quite as small as should be used for ease in reading. As a consequence of this it has been deemed best to put all other information required in the form of additional statements, with references to them in the body of the work. These statements are provided for in this bill further on.

"SEC. 3. That the said Secretary shall furnish, by the 1st of September in each year, copies of such blank forms for estimates to the various Departments, offices, or Bureaus authorized or required to make estimates for appropriations, accompanying the same with such instructions as to the manner in which they should be made as he may deem proper; and the said blanks shall be filled up in accordance with said instructions, and returned to him by the 1st day of October following, and may be accompanied by such statements, exhibits, or other information, in addition to that required by this act, as may be deemed useful to the proper understanding of the same."

In order to enable the Department to furnish the printed Book of Estimates at the commencement of the session, it is necessary that the blanks should be distributed and returned within a reasonable time. The dates fixed in this section are the dates at which the work is now done, and have not been found too early to allow a careful editing of the book before the session commences. The blank forms furnished during the current year were accompanied by instructions as to the manner in which they were to be filled; but as there was no specific law on the subject they necessarily assumed the form of suggestions from this Department, which were not always complied with. The permission to accompany the estimates with information additional to that required by law is desirable, because it enables officers submitting estimates to give a more detailed and elaborate explanation than might be convenient in the form of a simple brief note to their estimate. This is now done, and the explanations, where they are very elaborate, are printed in the appendix to the estimates.

"SEC. 4. That on the return of said estimates, the Secretary shall have them classified, arranged, and published in quarto form, and there shall be printed and bound, in addition to the usual number for the use of Congress, not more than five hundred copies for the use of the Executive Departments, to be distributed by said Secretary; and the copies for the use of Congress shall be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives in time for distribution at the commencement of each session."

The provisions of this section express the practice of the office in relation to the editing, printing, and distribution of the estimates, and contain one of the provisions of the resolution under which they are now printed. There is nothing in the section which will not strike the most casual observer as necessary to a proper and prompt preparation of the book. Under this law, the Book of Estimates will become a compendium of information, valuable to all branches of the Government, and it will be necessary to print more of them for the use of the Executive Departments than has been heretofore customary. The number now printed is four hundred. This section adds one hundred copies.

"SEC. 5. That whenever an estimate shall be submitted for any specific expenditure for a light-house, custom-house, post-office, fort, river, harbor, or other public work or improvement, every such estimate shall be accompanied by a detailed estimate of the whole cost of the work; and all subsequent estimates for any such work shall show the originally estimated costs and the whole amount previously appropriated. And where a subsequent estimate shall ask for an appropriation beyond the originally estimated cost, the reason for the excess and the anticipated amount thereof shall be fully stated."

This section is a revision and enlargement of an old law now on the statute-books, which applies only to such public works as require a plan to be made before work can be commenced. In the original it is made no one person's duty to see that this information is furnished, and, as it has been the practice of Congress to make appropriations of this class without having estimates of the probable cost before them, the law has gradually fallen into disuse and been forgotten. The value and importance of detailed estimates of this character, as well as the other information required by this section, would seem to be self-evident, and the result of its becoming a law will be to very greatly improve the Book of Estimates in its details, and at the same time enable Congress to act intelligently upon estimates submitted to it for the erection, improvement, and repair of public works of all kinds—a class of items which have formed, for many years past, a very large part of the annual expenditures, and which are more likely to increase than diminish in the future.

"SEC. 6. That whenever the estimates for salaries, contingent or current and ordinary expenses, exceed the amounts appropriated for the preceding fiscal year, either in the details or the aggregate, they shall be accompanied by concise notes pointing out and explaining the differences."

The importance of the provisions of this section will at once suggest itself to the Committees on Appropriations, and I feel confident that each member will realize how much labor and trouble he will be saved by having this information furnished him in the shape here provided for. It has been found impossible under the present law to obtain this information without delaying the work so greatly as to prevent its being ready by the commencement of the session.

A law requiring that the information shall be furnished, incorporated in the instructions and sent with the blanks, will enable the Department to secure it without the delay which would prevent the book reaching Congress in time for use at the commencement of the session.

"SEC. 7. That estimates for contingent, incidental, or miscellaneous expenses shall in no case include salaries or compensation of any kind whatever; but where the number of permanent employés specifically authorized by law shall prove inadequate, such additional number as may be required shall be estimated for in the general estimate for salaries of the Department or office requiring the additional number, and all such estimates shall be indicated by inserting the word 'submitted' in lieu of the date of the authorizing act hereinbefore required to be given."

Congress has several times, during the past five years, endeavored to prevent the use of contingent, incidental, and miscellaneous appropriations in the payment of salaries, but invariably the law has been a provision which, when compared with the language of the appropriation acts, did not affect them. Where an appropriation act contained a provision authorizing the employment of persons, the law prohibiting their payment would necessarily be inoperative if passed before the appropriation was made, the natural inference being that the latter act repealed the earlier, in so far as that particular item was concerned. The difficulty arises from the fact that the provision does not apply to the initial work of estimating, and in this section an attempt is made to provide in the book upon which Congress bases its appropriation legislation a means for preventing what Congress has uniformly shown a desire to prevent. So far as this Department has been able to control the matter of estimates this has been done, but while it remains a question outside of the law, the Secretary of the Treasury can do no more than provide that the estimates of his Department shall comply with the natural inference to be deduced from the legislation in relation to these funds.

"SEC. 8. That all estimates for increase of salaries shall be indicated in the manner prescribed in the preceding section for additional employés, whether the increase is over the amount authorized by law or the amount fixed in the last appropriation act; and every such estimate shall be accompanied by a brief statement of the reasons for said increase."

The provisions of this section have been suggested by the expressed desire of the House Committee on Appropriations to fix the salaries which shall be paid each year in the appropriation acts, and to enable the members to discover at a glance any change which may be made either in the organization or salaries of the Executive Departments. The only process by which this information can be had is to compel its being furnished by an act of Congress. During the last year it has been with the utmost difficulty that this Department has obtained the requisite information, and in many instances it has not been possible to do so for want of time.

Legal authority to require it, plainly stated in the instructions, will secure the information without the delay consequent upon a long correspondence explaining why it is required.

"SEC. 9. That the Secretary shall include in said estimates a statement of all permanent appropriations, both specific and indefinite, made by acts passed at any former session of Congress and remaining in force, with a proper reference to the volume of the statutes containing the same; and if it is believed any expenditures will be made under the same during the year for which the estimates are intended, there shall be given the same details, information, and references as are required in the case of other estimates."

The practice of this Department for the last three years has been to include in the estimates a statement of all permanent appropriations under which it is believed any expenditure will be made during the year for which the submitted estimates are intended. This, however, is not required by law, and may be discontinued at any time. The original draft of this section, as contained in H. R. 178, was based on the practice here stated, but, as several objections were raised by members to the form of it, it has here been changed to meet these objections. If Congress desires to continue to receive this information, this section should become law, since the first act of an administration antagonistic to Congress would be to gradually suppress it.

"SEC. 10. That the said Secretary shall add to the estimates a classified statement showing the expenditures, by appropriations, for the four preceding fiscal years. He shall also add a classified statement showing the unexpended balance of each appropriation at the commencement of the fiscal year in which the estimates are made; the amounts appropriated for that year; the repayments in excess of expenditures during the first quarter; the gross amounts available for expenditure; the amounts expended during the first quarter; the estimated amounts required for the remaining three quarters; and the am unts which may be carried into the general Treasury."

When the former draft of this law was submitted to Congress, some members of both the House and Senate Appropriation Committees suggested the propriety of adding to the body of the Book of Estimates more information in relation to the appropriations of the preceding fiscal year than was provided for in section 2, H. R. 178, but when it was explained to them that this information could not be printed in the place they suggested, without making the book very unwieldy, and therefore had been provided for in another section to be attached to the same book, the proposal to change the second section of that act was withdrawn. This tenth section, in its present form, is the result of a very careful study of the several methods in which the expenditures, balances, &c., have been reported to Congress during a number of years past, and is an attempt to put into one statement the valuable parts of all the various plans adopted. A comparison of this section with the law as it now stands, will discover that the information required to be given is very much more complete and elaborate than the old law requires, which, strictly construed, simply refers to unexpended balances. This has usually been supplemented by a statement of the expenditures for the first quarter of the current year, and with certain other information, but, as before stated, it is not required to be given by law. It has proved, however, of great assistance to Congress, and it has seemed wise to embody it in this provision, and thus make the statement permanent. The requirement that it shall include a statement showing the expenditures for the four preceding fiscal years is entirely new. This is partly included in the annual publication known as the "receipts and expenditures," but as this is published nearly two years after the expenditures are made, it becomes of very little service to Congress in connection with the estimates. I anticipate that this statement, prepared in the form here provided, will be of very great assistance to the House committee in preparing the appropriation bills, and in enabling both committees to ascertain how nearly the estimates for any particular purpose conform to the expenditures of previous years.

"SEC. 11. That the Secretary shall designate the title by which all appropriations shall be known; and such title, so designated, shall be the title under which estimates and expenditures shall thereafter be made. All specific appropriations for any building, fort, light-house, or other public work or improvement, whether for the original construction or for alterations, improvements, repairs, or grounds, shall be estimated for and expended under a general head applicable to the whole work; and there shall be but one appropriation account kept for each general object or particular building, fort, light-house, or other public work or improvement; and for the information of those concerned, the Secretary may cause to be compiled and printed the appropriations made by law in such form as he may deem best."

One of the most serious difficulties which meets any one who attempts to understand the expenditures of the United States Government grows out of the fact that there never has been any uniformity in the appropriation titles upon the proper books of the Treasury Department. An examination of the published statements of the Government will show that, in the estimates, appropriations, and expenditures, the same general object is mentioned year after year under different heads, which no one can identify unless personally acquainted with all the varying titles by which the object for which he is searching has been known. I do not know what the explanation of this is, other than that uniformity and systematic business capacity is a rare quality, and one not frequently found, and possibly not reasonably to be expected in the poorly-paid employés of the United States Government.

Thus you will see that to digest, arrange, and systematize the expenditures of the Government from its organization up to the present time is a labor which no man has been found with genius and industry enough to undertake and complete. I know from sad experience what an attempt of this kind means, and I do not overstate the difficulties in the way when I say that a life-time of devoted and constant labor would be required to make out of the expenditures of the Government a truthful and orderly compendium. The object of this section is to enable some one to designate the appropriations and provide that they shall be uniform from and after that designation. This is done at the present time so far as it can be under the authority of existing laws; but, as the result of this confusion is that Congress is induced to make much larger appropriations than it would be if there were a simple system by which they could obtain correct data for their action, the opposition to any such attempt would not be slight, and the only means of securing its efficient workings is by making it a provision of law. The last clause which provides for the compilation and printing of the appropriations was carried into effect with reference to the appropriations made at the last session of Congress, and has been found of such exceeding great value, not only to the Executive Departments, but to the Committees on Appropriations, that I am of opinion it will require no argument to induce the enactment of this provision.

"SEC. 12. That in case any appropriation shall be made by Congress without having been submitted in the estimates of the said Secretary, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury thereon until a certified copy of the act making the appropriation shall have been sent to him, and he shall have indorsed thereon the title by which the said appropriations shall be known; and all titles of appropriations shall convey a clear and concise idea of the general object for which the appropriations were made, and any further estimates for the same general object shall be submitted and the appropriations expended under the title thus established."

The provisions of this section are simply a continuation of the subject-matter of the preceding one, and treat of another character of cases which it is important to include, and which without this provision might be deemed exceptions to the rule.

"SEC. 13. That whenever Congress shall pass any relief act or resolution, payment under which is directed to be made out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, payment shall be made out of general indefinite appropriations upon the books relating to the accounts of the Department properly chargeable with the expenditure for 'payments under relief acts;' and a detailed statement of the payments under these accounts for the preceding fiscal year, with references to the acts and resolutions, by date, volume, page, and chapter or number, shall be printed in the estimates."

The custom has heretofore obtained in the Treasury Department of paying the appropriations made by relief acts under a special head applicable to the single act only. This makes it very difficult to assemble together the expenditures under these several accounts, and in consequence of this difficulty no such statement has ever been made, although it is one that would be very valuable to Congress. The provision that a statement of all these relief acts shall be printed in the estimates will secure to the Committees on Claims, whose labors are constantly increasing, and to the Committees on Appropriations, a complete statement of all these acts passed at each preceding session of Congress, with the amount appropriated by or expended under each one, all in a form easily referred to. I do not think it will require any very elaborate argument to prove the importance of having Congress informed as to how far each of the Executive Departments has complied with the terms of relief acts, nor how much has been expended in special cases where Congress was unable to state the amount which would be found to be due after a thorough examination and settlement. At present no such publication is made.

"SEC. 14. That all acts of Congress directing the head of any Department or any commission or board to examine and settle, or pay, any account or claim against the United States shall be construed to require the same to be done through the proper accounting officers, the same in all respects as if the said accounting officers were mentioned in the act, and payment shall be made in such manner as to charge the amount against the Department and out of the revenues properly chargeable with the expenditure."

The provisions of this section are new to the statute-books, although the point decided by it has been the practice of the accounting officers almost uniformly since the organization of the Government. The importance of putting it in the shape of a law is illustrated, however, by the fact that when Jefferson Davis was Secretary of War he refused to allow the accounts properly chargeable to the War Department to be settled through his office, and the result was that during the whole period of his incumbency the statements of the expenditures of the War Department were false to the extent of the several appropriations made in this manner.

"SEC. 15. That all judgments of the Court of Claims shall be paid from the regular appropriation for the payment of judgments of said court, through the proper accounting officers, in such manner as to charge the amount against the Department properly chargeable with the expenditure."

The present practice is to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims as if they were all for civil expenditures, and in the accounts they appear as so much money expended on account of the civil establishment of the Government. The fact is that nearly three-fourths of all of these expenditures are properly chargeable to the military and naval establishments, and the object of this section is to secure the settlement of the accounts in such a manner as will exhibit how much of the amount appropriated each year for the purpose has been expended on account of each of the several Departments of the Government.

"SEC. 16. That where statements, exhibits, explanations, or other information accompanying estimates are more elaborate than would be convenient for insertion in their proper place in the body of the work, they may be revised, condensed, printed in the appendix with proper references thereto, or transmitted to Congress in manuscript, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem best. And where, in the opinion of the Secretary, an estimate is not sufficiently explicit, or does not comply with law or the regulations thereunder, he may return the same for such corrections or alterations as may be necessary."

The provisions of this section enable the officer editing the Book of Estimates to secure a compliance with the laws and a simple and convenient order of publication. It was suggested by Mr. Maynard, of Tennessee, when the former bill was under consideration, that it should be amended so as to provide that nothing therein should authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to alter or in anywise change the sums estimated and submitted by either of the other Departments; but there is nothing in this section which would authorize any such construction or which possibly could be made available for any such purpose. The simple object is to secure the information which the law requires shall be given, and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury, or the editor of the book, to ask for it where it has not been furnished.

"SEC. 17. That whenever, in the settlement of the account of any disbursing officer, clerk, or agent, it is found that he has drawn money from one appropriation and disbursed it on account of expenses properly chargeable to another, the accounting officers shall credit and charge the amount in the account of said officer, clerk, or agent under the correct appropriations and transfer the same to a general account with the proper Department, to be known as the 'transfer account,' which latter account shall be closed monthly by warrant and counter-warrant, so far as the same can be done under existing and available appropriations. Said transfer, when practicable, shall include all vouchers presented, whether they are allowed or suspended, and shall be made in such manner as to debit the officer, clerk, or agent under the appropriations out of which the vouchers, when perfected, may be allowed. A statement of the unclosed balances in said transfer accounts, at the close of each fiscal year, shall be printed in the estimates."

During the late war the necessities of the public service were frequently so urgent and pressing as to render a delay until the meeting of Congress hazardous in the extreme. As the result of this the authority was assumed by the several heads of the military and naval service to authorize the advance of money from appropriations which were available and the disbursement of them for such objects as might be of immediate importance, but for which there were no available appropriations. When Congress assembled and an appropriation was made, it was assumed that these amounts would be transferred in the settlement of the officer's accounts.

As a matter of fact these settlements have never been completed, but are still going on and have constantly been so since the close of the war, until now they are almost entirely suspended, from the fact that the appropriations under which expenditures were chargeable are insufficient to meet the amounts expended on account of them. The object of this section is to enable these accounts to be settled in such a manner as will allow a statement of them to be made to Congress, with the view to such legislation as may be necessary in relation to the deficiencies. This and the next succeeding section are upon the same subject and should be considered together.

"SEC. 18. That nothing in the preceding section shall be construed to authorize any transfer of appropriations, or the advance of money from one general object of appropriation for disbursement on account of expenses properly chargeable to another; and all such transfers and advances are hereby prohibited: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may make advances to paymasters on foreign stations, or on a cruise, from the appropriation for "Pay of the Navy," to be used for general disbursements on account of expenses; but in every such case the paymaster shall make monthly returns of his disbursements, out of the money thus advanced, to the Fourth Auditor, in such form as said Auditor shall prescribe, showing the proper appropriations to which the same should be charged; and upon such returns the Auditor shall make the transfer provided for in the preceding section."

The provisions of this section, it will be observed, are intended to prevent the misuse of the authority contained in the preceding section, and to put upon the statute-book an express provision in regard to transfers and advances of appropriations. There is now in force a law prohibiting the transfer of appropriations, but it is defective, from the fact that the person who drafted it was not aware of another method of transferring, which accomplished the same result without violating the letter of the law.

The law as here drafted is put in such a form as to prohibit the use of an appropriation for any purpose other than that for which it was originally made by law, and it accomplishes the object by providing for both transfers of appropriations and improper advances of them. There is an exception to this rule which should be allowed, which is provided for in the proviso in relation to advances from the appropriation for "Pay of the Navy." This exception is exceedingly important, because it enables the Secretary of the Navy to make advances to paymasters when on foreign stations, or on a cruise, in reasonable sums, and within the amount of their bonds. If it were not for this the Department would be required to advance to the paymasters amounts from each appropriation out of which they might possibly make a disbursement, and this would increase the gross amount advanced to them to such an extent as to give them funds sometimes in treble the amount of their official bonds. The exception, however, is rendered harmless by the requirement that the paymaster shall report monthly his transactions, and that the transfer by counter-warrant shall be made upon these statements of transactions.

"SEC. 19. That it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States, whenever he shall forward or deliver any draft or warrant in favor of any disbursing officer, clerk, or agent who is to be charged and held accountable for the money authorized to be drawn thereby, to send with said draft or warrant, or to the officer, clerk, or agent who is to be charged and held accountable for the money, a printed or written letter setting forth the appropriations from which the money is advanced and the amount from each. Said letter shall also contain the last preceding and this section of this act, and any person violating any of the provisions of these two sections shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $100 for each and every offense."

The two preceding provisions of law require that some additional information should be furnished to the disbursing officers other than that already furnished, and as the Treasurer of the United States transmits the draft or pays the money to the credit of an officer, he is the proper person to furnish this information. If, when the officer receives his draft he is informed of the appropriation under which he can disburse the money advanced by it, and of the law regulating the manner of such disbursements, there will be no reasonable excuse for his failure to comply, and by inserting a penalty here, it seems to me, there will be a much greater assurance of a strict compliance than there would be if the section merely inhibited the doing of the particular thing without providing any punishment for it. These three sections I regard as of the utmost importance to the security and safety of the public accounts, and, if properly carried out, I do not believe there is a law on the statute-books which will be of more practical service to Congress in securing a compliance with the appropriation acts passed at each session.

"SEC. 20. That, for the purpose of settling the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States, there shall be an appropriation account on the proper books of the Treasury Department, to be known as the 'unavailable balances' account, from and to which all unavailable balances, except of lapsed appropriations, shall be transferred by warrants based upon the proper settlement of the First Auditor, confirmed by the First Comptroller. And all such transfers heretofore made, other than by warrants, including the amounts deposited with the States, shall be examined, stated, and transferred as herein directed. But all such transfers shall be made in such a manner as to debit the person or State properly chargeable therewith upon the personal account books of the Department."

Under the act organizing the Independent Treasury system, the Treasurer of the United States is accountable for all moneys covered into the Treasury by warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury, whether the money is received and held by himself or by an assistant treasurer or designated depositary. In the course of business, during the years since its organization, there have been some losses or defalcations in the assistant treasuries and designated depositories. The law further requires that the assistant treasurers and designated depositaries shall be held accountable for the moneys coming into their hands. In cases where defalcations or losses have occurred, and it has been necessary for the Government to sue on the bonds of those officers, a basis of action in each case has been made by the settlement of an account in which the Treasurer was credited with the amounts he had theretofore been charged with and the defaulting or delinquent officer was charged. The custom has been to do this upon the books of the Register's Office through an ordinary account of the First Auditor and First Comptroller, because there never has been an available appropriation through which the transaction could be made to appear in the published receipts and expenditures. As such a transaction affects the cash balance of the Government, it has been usual of late years to explain the discrepancy by a note in the cash account stating that so much has been credited or charged on account of "unavailable" in the Treasurer's general account. It is impossible to make a proper statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Government while such an inconsistent practice exists, and the object of this section is to provide that, instead of making settlements in such a manner as to compel them to be put in the published receipts and expenditures as a note, explaining a discrepancy, it shall be done so that they will appear in their proper place in the accounts. There is nothing in the provision which authorizes any change in practice, other than the requirement that the business shall be done by warrant instead of by a simple account, and the provision is protected from any possible misuse by the closing sentence in regard to the manner in which the amounts shall be charged.

"SEC. 21. That when money standing to the credit of a disbursing officer, clerk, or agent shall be repaid into the Treasury as 'outstanding liabilities,' under the provisions of the act of May 2, 1866, it shall be covered and credited upon the books of the office in which the officer, clerk, or agent was charged when the advance was made to him; and the Register of the Treasury shall furnish to the Second, Third, Fourth, and Sixth Auditors a transcript of all amounts heretofore covered into the Treasury, as repayments of amounts standing to the credit of disbursing officers, clerks, or agents who are charged on their books, respectively; and hereafter each of said Auditors shall keep an 'outstanding liabilities' account for the repayments herein referred to on the books of their respective offices in the manner prescribed in the said act."

This section simply modifies a former provision of law passed at the instance of the Treasurer of the United States for the better settlement of his accounts. As it now stands, the law has created very great confusion, and materially increased the labor of the Department, without rendering the business as secure as it should be. The original law is entirely correct and proper; but one provision of it was based upon the theory that the system of business in the Treasury Department was uniform, simple, and harmonious. This is not the fact, because the several additions to the Department were each created upon an independent basis of its own, and were not made to harmonize with the original organization as drafted by the first Secretary of the Treasury. I anticipate a very great relief in every accounting office by the process here provided for, and at the same time a greater degree of security to the Government from unjust and improper claims on account of business which should have been closed years ago. There is nothing in this provision which authorizes the expenditure of money, nor is there in any provision of this act. The sole object, as before stated, has been to simplify the system of business in the Department, and to have the work done with the least labor, the greatest accuracy, and in the promptest manner.

"SEC. 22. That, in order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to keep an accurate account of the several loans of the United States, there may be kept on the books of the Department an appropriation account, to be known as the 'premium and discount account,' which shall be charged with the discount and credited with the premium hereafter accruing on loans in conformity with law; and all loans which have heretofore been sold at a premium or discount may be credited or charged, as the case may require, with the amount thereof, and the amount thus credited or charged shall be carried to the account herein authorized: Provided, That the said Secretary may direct a separate account to be kept both of premium and discount on each loan, if in his judgment it is desirable so to do."

In an examination of the loan accounts of the Government, commenced shortly after the present Secretary of the Treasury came into office, it was discovered that but very few of the loan accounts, as published in the book known as the "Receipts and Expenditures," were entirely correct. The resultant error arising out of the differences in these accounts up to date is something over $116,000,000. The examination of them has been continued until the present time, and it will require at least three years' further examination to fully complete the investigation. During its progress it was found that the practice of covering into the Treasury, as a receipt from any given loan, only the amount actually received, had been uniform from the organization of the Treasury to the present time, so that whenever a loan was negotiated at a discount the account which showed its redemption and the account which showed the money derived from it were found to disagree by the amount of the discount. As there has been no discount account kept, the gross expenditures of the Government appear to have been over $116,000,000 more than the amount received.

To remedy this defect this section is submitted, and under its provisions it will be possible hereafter to make a correct statement of the public-debt accounts from the receipts and expenditures of the Government, from which this statement should undoubtedly be made.

"SEC. 23. That whenever Congress shall authorize the issue of bonds or other evidences of debt in satisfaction of any claim against the United States, or for which no money shall be received, it shall be the duty of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to cause an account therefor to be settled in the usual manner, and the amount found due to be paid to the Treasurer of the United States, to be by him deposited in the general Treasury as a subscription on account of said bonds or other evidences of debt. And all cases of this character which have heretofore occurred may be examined and settled in such manner as to enable an exact statement of the public debt of the United States to be made from the warrant account of receipts and expenditures; and the monthly publication of the statement of the public debt of the United States shall be continued in such numbers as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem advisable."

The remarks upon the preceding section are also applicable to this, which is intended to remedy another very serious defect in the present system of accounting. A more complete statement of the necessity and desirability of these two sections will be found in Table I of the finance report of this year. The present monthly publication of the statement of the public debt has been found of such general value to all classes of the community that a provision requiring its permanent continuance should be placed upon the statute-books. It is now printed under the general authority of law which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to print such statements as he may deem of importance. Without a specific provision of law in relation to this subject, it is optional with the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue this publication at any time.

"SEC. 24. That in all cases where money has been or shall be erroneously covered into the Treasury of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority, by warrant and deposit, to correct said erroneous entry, charging the amount to a general appropriation account, to be known as 'transfer of moneys erroneously covered.' But nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the payment from the Treasury of any moneys thus erroneously covered without specific authority of law."

It sometimes happens that in covering money into the Treasury it is credited to an erroneous source of revenue, and there is now no law authorizing any correction of these errors. An error once made must remain uncorrected. The object of this section is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to correct such errors, and this authority is given under such restrictions as to confine it solely to the object to be attained. It is very important that this should be done in order that the accounts of the Government may be accurately kept.

"SEC. 25. That all proceeds of sales of old material, condemned stores, supplies, or other public property of any kind, after deducting the necessary expenses of sale, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous revenues derived from the 'proceeds of Government property,' and shall not be withdrawn or applied except in consequence of a subsequent appropriation made by law; and a detailed statement of all such proceeds of sales shall be included in the estimates. But this section shall not be held to repeal the existing authority of law in relation to marine hospitals, revenue-cutters, navy pension fund, prize-money, or the clothing fund of the Navy, nor to prohibit the return to the proper appropriation of the proceeds of authorized sales of materials, stores, or supplies to officers and men of the Army and Navy, to exploring or surveying expeditions, or to the Indian service. And it shall be the duty of the Register of the Treasury to furnish to the proper accounting officers copies of all warrants covering such proceeds, where the same may be necessary in the settlement of accounts in their respective offices."

Congress, at its last session, incorporated the original of this section in an appropriation act, and, immediately after it was approved, passed an act repealing a portion of its provisions. This section is drafted so as to combine the two provisions of the law as they now stand, and has been drawn with very great care. It has been found that in all of the Departments, as well as in the War Department, in whose interest the act of June 8 was passed, sales of condemned stores, &c., could not be made, because the law did not allow the expenses to be paid out of the proceeds, and there were no appropriations out of which they could be paid. The result is that large quantities of stores belonging to other Departments than the War have not been sold because of this inability of the various Departments to pay the necessary expenses of sale. There does not seem to be any good reason why the provision should not apply to all of the Departments, especially as this has been the uniform practice ever since the organization of the Government, and the strictest rules of accounting are always applied to these expenses. The reasons for excepting certain items from the provisions of this section are as follows: Marine hospitals are sustained by a tax of 40 cents per month upon the pay of every seaman in the United States. This tax is appropriated for the support of the marine-hospital establishment. The law authorizing the building of new revenue-cutters and the disposal of the worn-out and valueless vessels of this service was based upon the report of a commission appointed to consider the question of its improvement. It authorizes the use of the proceeds of those sold in the building of new and more suitable ones to take their place. This re-organization is nearly completed, and, when it shall have been, the law will expire by limitation. The Navy pension fund is one-half of the proceeds of captured vessels set apart as a fund the interest of which is applicable to the payment of Navy pensions and the support of naval beneficiaries. Congress each year appropriates for these purposes out of this interest. Prize-money is the other moiety of the proceeds of prize cases, which by law is distributable among the persons participating in the capture. The clothing fund of the Navy is a self-sustaining fund created many years since for the purpose of enabling the Navy Department to accommodate the sailors with uniforms and other articles of clothing, the cost of which is deducted from their pay, and the amount thus deducted is repaid to the fund, thus keeping it a permanent fund for the purposes for which it was instituted.

It would be manifestly improper to charge as expenses incurred under appropriations for the support of the Army or Navy the cost of materials, stores, or supplies sold to officers and men of the Army or Navy, or to exploring or surveying expeditions, or to the Indian service, since it would thus appear that the Department which furnished the supplies had expended more money for its service than it actually had expended, and, unless there is some provision of law authorizing the return to the proper appropriation of the cost of these supplies, it will be natural for the Executive Departments, whose appropriations are used for the purchase of them, to decline to furnish them at all. The present method of supplying expeditions and Indians with subsistence and other stores is one of great economy, as the Army purchases in large quantities, by which it obtains supplies at lower prices than can be had for purchases in smaller quantities. The last provision requiring the Register to furnish copies of the warrants covering these proceeds is necessary, because of the method of business in the Department.

"SEC. 26. That nothing in the preceding section shall be construed to authorize the retention and re-use of moneys derived from sales of public property of any kind whatever by disbursing officers or others, but all such moneys shall be immediately deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, on the proper account, without other abatement than the necessary expenses of sale: Provided, That in cases where officers in charge of public property are stationed at such remote distances from a legal depository for public moneys as to render the expense of depositing the proceeds of sales unusually large, the Secretary of the Treasury may, on the request of the head of the proper Department, and by a special order, authorize said officer to retain and re-use such proceeds of sales; but all such special orders shall continue in force only to the close of the fiscal year in which they are issued. And all officers thus authorized shall render to the proper Auditor at the close of each quarter a statement of all moneys thus received and retained, upon which statement he shall be charged and held accountable under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may approve."

A careful examination of the accounts rendered to the auditing officers of the Government by some branches of the service discovers the fact that disbursing officers have been in the habit of retaining in their possession and re-using the proceeds of certain sales made by them. It was supposed that the provisions of the preceding section would put an end to this. It has been found, however, that that section does not accomplish this object, and therefore this section has been added. It may be that there are instances where it would be greatly to the advantage of the Government to allow this retention and re-use of moneys, but it should only be done under very stringent rules, which are here provided, and the section as drafted contains a statement of the circumstances under which the exception to the rule should be allowed.

"SEC. 27. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall in June of each year transmit to the head of each Department a statement of the balances of appropriations for the service of his Department, which shall appear by the books of the Register of the Treasury to be unexpended at the close of business on the last day of May.

"SEC. 28. That on receipt of said statement the head of the Department to whom it is sent shall cause to be certified thereon how much of each unexpended balance will be required to meet outstanding liabilities properly chargeable thereto, and how much thereof may be carried into the general Treasury; and said statement, thus certified, shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury within fifteen days after its receipt.

"SEC. 29. That upon the return of said statements the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue his warrants thereon, directing all amounts which it appears from them 'may be carried into the general Treasury' to be charged to the proper appropriations and credited to the general account of appropriations as surplus funds; and all amounts thus disposed of shall remain in the Treasury like other unappropriated money, and shall not be transferred, withdrawn, applied, or used, except in consequence of subsequent specific authority of law.

"SEC. 30. That all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury without being drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years from the date of the last appropriation made by law shall be reported by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st day of June in each year to the accounting officers whose duty it is to settle accounts thereunder, and said accounting officers shall examine the records of their respective offices and certify to the Secretary whether said balances, or any part of either of them, will be required in the settlement of pending accounts. If it shall appear that such balances, or any part of either of them, will not be required for this purpose, the said Secretary may include in his warrants the amounts not so required, whether the head of the proper Department shall have certified that it 'may be carried into the general Treasury' or not. But no appropriation for the payment of the interest or principal of the public debt, or to which Congress may have given a longer duration by law, shall be thus treated. A statement of the amounts carried into the Treasury as surplus funds during the preceding fiscal year shall be included in the estimates.

"SEC. 31. That it shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend for the service of any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that year, or to involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations. And it shall be the duty of the several officers of the Government having executive control of appropriations to provide for such supervision of the appropriations under their direction as shall secure the proper observance of the provisions of this section; and any person violating its provisions or the regulations thereunder shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $100 for each and every offense."

The original surplus-fund act was passed in the year 1789, and remained in force until 1853, when a new act was passed, under which all money not required for expenditure was carried off the books, until the passage of the act of July 12, 1870, which provided a new method of doing it. The experience of the last two years has demonstrated, to the satisfaction of every one anxious to see the accounts of the Government properly kept and intelligently stated, that there never has been in the history of legislation a more unwise, injudicious, or perplexing law upon the statute-books than the fifth section of the act of July 12, 1870, as it is now construed. At every session since it was passed Congress has appropriated moneys, with provisos exempting them from the operations of this provision. As a consequence, the statements of the expenditures, balances, &c., which are required by law to be submitted to Congress at the commencement of each session, have been made in such a manner as to be incomprehensible to any one but the person who makes them, or whose daily business it is to examine accounts under this law.

The provisions of the five sections here offered on this subject have been very carefully studied, with a view to express the provisions of the act of July 12, 1870, more explicitly, and to secure the object of Congress without such contradictory and confused provisions of law as render it possible to construe the statute to suit the end desired.

I would call particular attention to the provisions of section 31, which are, in my opinion, of the utmost importance in the form in which they are put. It accomplishes the object of the act alluded to in a more thorough manner, and at the same time will avoid attempts on the part of executive officers to secure special legislation with reference to some particular appropriation under their charge. It would take much time to state all the facts which I have regarding the pernicious effect of this fifth section of July 12, 1870, but I am sure, if half were told, Congress would repeal the law at once, even though a return to the old practice is the result. It encourages extravagance in every branch of the service; and I am confident that an impartial examination of the effects of it will show that it has cost the Government since its enactment an average of $500,000 per annum in expenditures that would not have been incurred but for its existence. The President has said that the surest way to secure the repeal of an obnoxious law is to strictly enforce it. He might have added, also, that the surest way to induce evasions of bad laws is to put them on the statute-books in such a crude form as to make it possible for an ingenious officer to nullify them simply by a strict adherence to the letter of their requirements.

"SEC. 32. That all annual salaries, compensation, pay, or commutation, to persons in the service of the United States, shall be computed and paid on the following basis: When payable quarterly, one-fourth of the annual sum; when payable monthly, one-twelfth of the annual sum; and when payment is to be made for a less period than one month, it shall be as nearly as practicable on the basis of a per diem compensation at the rate of one three hundred and sixty-fifth of the annual sum: Provided, That no variation in these rules shall be made on account of leap-year: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may direct that any quarterly salary be made payable monthly. And the said Secretary shall cause to be prepared and printed tables upon the foregoing basis, including per diem pay at various rates, which, when published, shall be the rule in all branches of the Government for the payment of per diem, monthly, quarterly, and annual salaries, compensation, pay, or commutation."

The present method of computing and paying salaries in the several Departments of the Government is not only very complex, but very diverse. The Army and Navy are now by law paid monthly, on the basis of this section, while all civil officers are paid either quarterly or monthly, and, when paid monthly, the payment is made upon a quarterly basis, which varies with the number of days contained in a quarter. It results that an officer receiving a salary of $1,800 a year will receive during the year, if paid monthly, not less than eight different compensations, namely: January, thirty-one days, $155; February, twenty-eight days, $140; April, thirty days, $148.30; May, thirty-one days, $153.40; July, thirty-one days, $151 60; September, thirty days, $146.80; and in leap-year, January, thirty-one days, $153.30; and February, twenty-nine days, $143.40. The object of this section is to provide a uniform, simple, and easy rule for the payment of all salaries, and everything in the nature of salaries. By it will be saved an immense amount of labor in the various accounting offices, and very great confusion in the minds of persons not acquainted with the complex method of computation now in use.

"SEC. 33. That whenever application shall be made to any Department of the Government for copies of papers, documents, or records on file therein, by any person other than a Government officer, agent, or employé, requiring the same for official use, said copies shall be furnished on payment of the following fees: Written copies, twenty-five cents per one hundred words; printed blanks, filled up, fifteen cents per page; photographic copies, the estimated cost of making them; certificates under seal, fifty cents each. And original papers shall only be removed from the files of one Department for use in some other Department, or by United States officers before the courts; and in the latter case photographic copies where it is practicable, and certified copies where it is not, shall be placed in the files in lieu and until the return of said originals. But copies, or originals, of any kind shall only be furnished when in the opinion of the head of the Department it is consistent with the public interests so to do; and the heads of the several Departments may make such rules as they shall think necessary not inconsistent herewith, under which said copies and originals will be furnished, and all moneys received from this source shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous revenue received from 'copies of papers and records.'"

There is now no law which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to charge for copies of papers which may be furnished to individuals requiring them for their own benefit. The consequence of this defect in the law is that the Treasury Department is compelled to constantly employ a large corps of clerks in making copies of papers on file in the Department for the use of private individuals, without any compensation whatever. This is manifestly wrong, and it is the object of this section to provide a rule by which such copies shall be paid for at about the cost to the Government of making them. It is estimated that it costs the Treasury Department at least $50,000 a year to make the copies required by individuals for their own use. If this provision should become a law, in all probability there will be fewer copies required, and parties asking for them will be more particular in designating exactly what they want.

"SEC. 34. That, except where otherwise provided, the Secretary of the Treasury may make all needful regulations for carrying this act into effect, and all such regulations not inconsistent with the provisions hereof, when approved and promulgated by the said Secretary, shall have the force and effect of law."

It is of the utmost importance that some particular person should be charged with the preparation and promulgation of regulations under all laws, whose duty it must be to see that every person affected by them is fully informed of their contents. The object of this section is to fix that duty upon the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to whose business the most of the provisions of this act apply.

"SEC. 35. That this act shall be in effect from and after June 30, 1873, and may be referred to and quoted as the 'estimates act of 1873.'"

The amount of labor necessary to prepare the regulations under these laws is very considerable, and it will require about the time between the adjournment of Congress and the 30th of June next to get ready for and do this. Hence the provision as to the time when this act shall go into effect. A provision for a simple title by which the act shall be known is of manifest value to any person who has had to deal with frequent references to statutes.

"SEC. 36. That the following acts and parts of acts and resolutions and parts of resolutions are hereby repealed, but anything to be done to complete business already commenced may be continued to completion under the statutes hereby repealed. And the references to laws hereby repealed are to the same as contained in the edition of the Statutes at Large, published by Little, Brown & Co., under and by virtue of the resolution of March 3, 1845, and the continuation thereof:

This section repeals all laws so far as they have been found in relation to the subjects treated of in this act, and it follows the plan laid down by the code commission in the preparation of their work.

Annexed hereto will be found the text of the laws it is proposed to repeal by this bill.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. H. SAVILLE,
Chief Clerk Treasury Department.

Hon. GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

STATUTES TO BE REPEALED BY THE FOREGOING ACT.

Act of March 3, 1795, chapter 45 volume 1, page 437, in part, namely, section 16:

* * * * * * * *

"SEC. 16. That in regard to any sum which shall have remained unexpended upon any appropriation other than for the payment of interest on the funded debt; for the payment of interest upon and re-imbursement according to contract of any loan or loans made on account of the United States; for the purposes of the sinking fund; or for a purpose, in respect to which a longer duration is specially assigned by law, for more than two years after the expiration of the calendar year in which the act of appropriation shall have been passed, such appropriation shall be deemed to have ceased and been determined; and the sum so unexpended shall be carried to an account on the books of the Treasury, to be denominated 'the surplus fund.' But no appropriation shall be deemed to have so ceased and been determined until after the year 1795, unless it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the object thereof hath been fully satisfied, in which case it shall be lawful for him to cause to be carried the unexpended residue thereof to the said account of 'the surplus fund.'"

Act of March 3, 1809, chapter 28, volume 2, page 535, in part, namely, the proviso in section 1 in relation to transfer of appropriations:

"SEC. 1. * * * * * * *
Provided, nevertheless, That during the recess of Congress the President of the United States may, and he is hereby, authorized on the application of the Secretary of the proper Department, and not otherwise, to direct, if in his opinion necessary for the public service, that a portion of the moneys appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure in that Department be applied to another branch of expenditure in the same Department, in which case a special account of the moneys thus transferred and of their application shall be laid before Congress during the first week of their next ensuing session."

Act of March 3, 1817, chapter 96, volume 3, page 390:

"SEC. 1. That nothing contained in the act of the 3d of March, 1809, entitled 'An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments,' shall be construed to authorize the President of the United States to direct any sum appropriated to fortifications, arsenals, armories, custom-houses, docks, navy-yards, or buildings of any sort, or to munitions of war, or to the pay of the Army or Navy, to be applied to any other object of public expenditure."

Act of May 1, 1820, chapter 52, volume 3, page 567, in part, namely, sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8:

"SEC. 1. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be carried to the account of the surplus fund any moneys appropriated for the Department of War or of the Navy which may remain unexpended in the Treasury or in the hands of the Treasurer as agent for those Departments, whenever he shall be informed by the Secretaries of those Departments that the object for which the appropriation was made has been effected. And it shall be the duty of the Secretaries of War and Navy Departments to cause any balance of moneys drawn out of the Treasury which shall remain unexpended after the object for which the appropriation was made shall be effected, to be repaid to the Treasury of the United States, and such moneys, when so repaid, shall be carried to the surplus fund.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments to lay before Congress, on the 1st day of February of each year, a statement of the appropriations of the preceding year for their Departments respectively, showing the amount appropriated under each specific head of appropriation, the amount expended under each, and the balance remaining unexpended, either in the Treasury or in the Treasurer's hands as agent of the War or Navy Departments, on the 31st December preceding. And it shall be further the duty of the Secretaries aforesaid to estimate the probable demands which may remain on each appropriation, and the balance shall be deducted from the estimates of their Departments respectively for the service of the current year; and accounts shall also be annually rendered in manner and form as aforesaid, exhibiting the sums expended out of the estimates aforesaid, and the balance, if any, which may remain on hand, together with such information connected with the same as shall be deemed proper. And whenever any moneys appropriated to the Department of War or of the Navy shall remain unexpended in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent of either of those Departments, for more than two years after the expiration of the calendar year in which the act of appropriation shall have been passed or to which it refers, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of such Department to inform the Secretary of the Treasury of the fact, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon cause such moneys to be carried to the account of the surplus fund: Provided, That when an act making an appropriation shall assign a longer duration for the completion of its object, no transfer of any unexpended balance to the account of the surplus fund shall be made until the expiration of the time fixed in such act.

"SEC. 3. That in the settlement of the accounts of the War Department for services or supplies accruing prior to the 1st of July, 1815, the expenditures shall be charged to arrearages, and the balances of public money hereafter recovered out of advances made in the War Department for services or supplies prior to the date aforesaid shall be returned to the Treasury, and by the Secretary of the Treasury be carried to the surplus fund.

"SEC. 4. That nothing contained in the act of March 3, 1809, entitled 'An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments,' shall be so construed as to allow any appropriation whatever for the service of one year to be transferred to another branch of expenditure in a different year, nor shall any appropriations be deemed subject to be transferred, under the provisions of the above-mentioned act, after they shall have been placed in the hands of the Treasurer as agent of the War or Navy Departments.

"SEC. 5. That the above-mentioned act of the 3d of March, 1809, shall be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the President shall be authorized to direct a portion of the moneys appropriated for any one of the following branches of expenditure in the Military Department, namely: for the subsistence of the Army, for forage, for the Medical and Hospital Department, for the Quartermaster's Department; to be applied to any other of the above-mentioned branches of expenditure in the same Department. And that the President shall be also further authorized to direct a portion of the moneys appropriated for any of the following branches of expenditure in the Naval Department, namely, for provisions, for medicine and hospital stores, for repairs of vessels, for clothing, to be applied to any other of the above-mentioned branches of expenditure in the same Department; and that no transfers of appropriation from or to other branches of expenditure shall be hereafter made.

"SEC. 6. That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State, or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and excepting also contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the Army or Navy, and contracts by the Quartermaster's Department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments.

"SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to annex to the annual estimates of the appropriations required for the public service a statement of the appropriations for the service of the year which may have been made by former acts; and also a statement of the sums remaining in the Treasury, or in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent of the War and Navy Departments, from the appropriations of former years, estimating the amount of those sums which will not be required to defray expenses incurred in a previous year, and showing the whole amount which will be subject to the disposition of the executive government in the year to which the estimates apply."

Act of July 2, 1836, chapter 268, volume 5, page 78, in part, namely, section 2:

* * * * * * * *

"SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, under the restrictions of the act of the 1st of May, 1820, to make transfers from one head of appropriations for fortifications to that of another for a like object, whenever, in his opinion, the public interest shall require it."

Act of April 6, 1838, chapter 54, volume 5, page 223, in part, namely, the proviso at the end of section 1:

"SEC. 1. * * * * * * *
Provided, That there shall exist in the President and in the Postmaster General the same power to transfer funds from one to another head of appropriation, between the appropriations above made for the service of the General Post-Office, as exists in the President and any other head of an Executive Department to transfer funds appropriated under one head to the service of another, in any other branch of the public service."

Act of August 26, 1842, chapter 202, volume 5, page 525, in part, namely, sections 14 and 23:

"SEC. 14. That it shall be the duty of the several heads of Departments, in communicating estimates of expenditures and appropriations to Congress, and to any of the committees thereof, to specify, as nearly as may be convenient, the sources from which such estimates are derived, and the calculations upon which they are founded; and, in so doing, to discriminate between such estimates as are conjectural in their character and such as are framed upon actual information and application from disbursing officers; and, in communicating the several estimates, reference shall be given to the laws and treaties by which they are authorized, the dates thereof, and the volume, page, and section in which the necessary provisions are contained."

* * * * * * * *

"SEC. 23. That in case the sum appropriated for any object shall be found more than sufficient to meet the expense thereby contemplated, the surplus may be applied, under the direction of the head of the proper Department, to supply the deficiency of any other item in the same Department or Office: Provided, That the expenditure for newspapers and periodicals shall not exceed the amount specifically appropriated to that object by this act."

Act of August 31, 1842, chapter 286, volume 5, page 581, in part, namely, section 11:

* * * * * * * *

"SEC. 11. That all acts or parts of acts authorizing the President of the United States, or the Secretary of the proper Department, under his direction, to transfer any portion of the moneys appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure in that Department, to be applied to another branch of expenditure in the same Department, be, and are hereby, so far as relates to the Department of the Navy, repealed."

Act of March 3, 1843, chapter 100, volume 5, page 645, in part, namely, section 2:

* * * * * * * *

"SEC. 2. That in case the sum appropriated for any object of contingencies should be found more than sufficient to meet the expense thereby contemplated, the surplus may be applied under the direction of the head of the proper Department, to supply the deficiency of any other item in the same Department or Office: Provided, That the expenditure for newspapers and periodicals shall not exceed the amounts specifically appropriated to that object by this act, except in the State Department."

Act of June 16, 1844, chapter 105, volume 5, page 693, in part, namely, section 2:

"SEC. 2. That whenever, hereafter, in submitting to Congress the annual estimates from the several Executive Departments of the Government, it shall be found that the usual items of such estimates vary materially in amount from the appropriation ordinarily asked for the object named, and especially from the appropriation granted for the same objects for the year next preceding, and whenever new items not theretofore usual shall be introduced into such estimates for any year, the estimates shall be accompanied by minute and full explanations from the head of the appropriate Department, of all such variations and new items, setting forth the reasons and grounds upon which the amounts are required, and the different items added; and whenever any such estimates, whether annual or special, shall ask an appropriation for any new specific expenditure, such as the construction of a fort, the erection of a custom-house, or other public building, or the construction of any other public work requiring a plan before the building or work can be properly completed, every such estimate shall be accompanied by a full plan and detailed estimates of the cost of the whole work; and all subsequent estimates for every such work shall give the original estimated cost, the aggregate amount theretofore appropriated for the same, and the amount actually expended thereupon, as well as the amount asked for the current year for which such estimate shall be made; and whenever any such subsequent estimate shall ask for an appropriation for any such work beyond the original estimate of the cost, the full reasons for the excess, and the extent of the anticipated excess, shall be also stated."

Resolution of January 7, 1846, number 2, volume 9, page 108:

"SEC. 1. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the estimates of appropriations which he is by law required to prepare and submit to Congress to be printed, and copies of the same to be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives in time for distribution at the commencement of each session; and that the Clerk distribute the said estimates in the manner in which documents printed by Congress are directed to be distributed."

Act of March 3, 1847, chapter 48, volume 9, page 171, in part, namely, the paragraph on page 171, in relation to moneys derived from the sale of naval stores and the transfer of the clothing fund and appropriation of the Navy:

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 1. That from and after the passage of this act all moneys derived from the sale of all stores and other articles belonging to the Navy shall revert to that appropriation from which such stores and other articles were originally purchased; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to refund to the appropriation for 'clothing for the Navy' the proceeds of all sales of condemned Navy clothing which have been paid into the Treasury of the United States subsequent to the 1st day of August, 1844, as shall appear from the accounts of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing and the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury; and it shall not be lawful hereafter to make transfers from the clothing fund, or the head of the appropriation for 'clothing for the Navy,' to any other head of appropriation, except in the adjustment of the accounts of disbursing officers, at the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury."

Act of March 3, 1849, chapter 110, volume 9, page 398, in part, namely, section 3:

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to submit to Congress at the commencement of the next regular session estimates of appropriations which may be required to provide for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs and also from the public lands for the second half of the next fiscal year, and separate estimates for the said purpose for the year ending the 30th June, 1850, and similar estimates from year to year thereafter."

Act of August 31, 1852, chapter 108, volume 10, page 98, in part, namely, section 10:

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 10. That where any moneys shall have remained unexpended upon any appropriations by law, other than for the payment of interest on the funded debt or the payment of interest and re-imbursement according to contract of any loan or loans made on account of the United States, as likewise moneys appropriated for a purpose in respect to which a larger duration is specially assigned by law, for more than two years after the expiration of the fiscal year in which the act shall have been passed, all and any such appropriations shall be deemed to have ceased and been determined, and the moneys so unexpended shall be immediately thereafter carried, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the account on the books of the Treasury denominated the 'surplus fund,' to remain like other unappropriated moneys in the Treasury, and it shall not be lawful for any cause or pretense whatsoever to transfer, withdraw, apply, or use for any purpose whatever any moneys carried as aforesaid to the surplus fund without further and specific appropriations by law."

Act of August 31, 1852, chapter 110, volume 10, page 107, in part, namely, section 2:

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts authorizing the President of the United States or the Secretary of the proper Department, under his direction, to transfer any portion of the moneys appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure in that Department to be applied to another branch of expenditure in the same Department be, and are hereby, so far as relates to the Department of War, repealed; and no portions of the moneys appropriated by this act shall be applied to the payment of any expenses incurred prior to the 1st day of July, 1852. But nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the President from authorizing appropriations for the subsistence of the Army, for forage, for the Medical and Hospital Departments, and for the Quartermaster's Department, to be applied to any other of the above-mentioned branches of expenditure in the same Department, and appropriations made for a specific object for one fiscal year shall not be transferred to any other object after the expiration of that year."

Act of March 3, 1855, chapter 175, volume 10, page 670, in part, namely, section 8:

"SEC. 8. That the provisions contained in the second section of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government,' approved the 17th day of June, 1844, be required to be carried into effect in all particulars, any act in conflict therewith being hereby repealed; and all estimates for the compensation of officers of the Government authorized by law to be employed shall be based upon the express provisions of law, and not upon the authority of executive distribution thereof; and the act and section authorizing the same, with the volume and page where such authority may be found, shall be cited in each and all estimates respectively."

Act of June 22, 1860, chapter 181, volume 12, page 81, in part, namely, the second proviso in the ninth paragraph, as follows: "That the estimates for expenditures for such purposes shall hereafter be given in detail."

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 4. That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, required to report to the Secretary of the Treasury annually, prior to the 1st day of November of each year, his estimate of the money required for the service of the Post-Office Department for the ensuing fiscal year; which estimate shall be reported to Congress with the printed estimates of appropriations required by the joint resolution of the 7th of January, 1846."

Act of July 12, 1870, chapter 251, volume 16, page 251, in part, namely, sections 5, 6, and 7:

"SEC. 5. That all balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year, shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year, or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year; and such balances not needed for the said purposes shall be carried to the surplus fund: Provided, That this section shall not apply to appropriations known as permanent or indefinite appropriations.

"SEC. 6. That all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury, without being drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years from the date of the last appropriation made by law, shall be reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Auditor of the Treasury whose duty it is to settle accounts thereunder, and the Auditor shall examine the books of his office, and certify to the Secretary whether such balances will be required in the settlement of any accounts pending in his office; and if it shall appear that such balances will not be required for this purpose, then the Secretary may include such balances in his warrant, whether the head of the proper Department shall have certified that it may be carried into the general Treasury or not. But no appropriation for the payment of the interest or principal of the public debt, or to which Congress may have given a longer duration of law, shall be thus treated.

"SEC. 7. That it shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or to involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations."

Act of May 8, 1872, chapter 140, volume 17, page 83, in part, namely, section 5:

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 5. That all proceeds of sales of old material, condemned stores, supplies, or other public property of any kind, shall hereafter be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, on account of 'proceeds of Government property,' and shall not be withdrawn or applied except in consequence of a subsequent appropriation made by law; and a detailed statement of all such proceeds of sales shall be included in the appendix to the Book of Estimates. But this section shall not be held to repeal the existing authority of law in relation to marine hospitals, revenue-cutters, the clothing fund of the Navy, or the sale of commissary stores to the officers of the Army. And it shall be the duty of the Register of the Treasury to furnish to the proper accounting officers copies of all warrants covering such proceeds, where the same may be necessary in the settlement of accounts in their respective offices."

Act of June 8, 1872, chapter 348, volume 17, page 337:

"SEC. 1. That the fifth section of the act approved May 8, 1872, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, shall not be held to apply to materials, stores, or supplies sold to officers and soldiers of the Army or to exploring or surveying expeditions authorized by law, and that said section shall not be held to repeal such part of paragraph 1032, Revised Army Regulations of 1863, as provides that expenses of sales of military stores or supplies regularly condemned will be paid from their proceeds."

A bill to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes in relation to estimates of appropriations and public accounts.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

SECTION 1. That all estimates and communications asking for appropriations for any branch of the Government shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That the said Secretary shall cause to be prepared blank forms for estimates, so arranged as to exhibit in a uniform, simple, and comprehensive manner the general object for which the appropriation is asked, the specific objects of expenditure in detail, the total amount required under each general head, the date of the act or resolution authorizing or of the treaty stipulating for the expenditure, with references to the volume, page, and section or article of the statutes where the same may be found, and the amount appropriated for the preceding year: Provided, That where an item of expenditure is only authorized by reason of an appropriation having been previously made therefor, in lieu of the date thereof the word "appropriated" shall be inserted.

SEC. 3. That the said Secretary shall furnish, by the 1st of September in each year, copies of such blank forms for estimates to the various Departments, Offices, or Bureaus authorized or required to make estimates for appropriations, accompanying the same with such instructions as to the manner in which they should be made as he may deem proper; and the said blanks shall be filled up in accordance with said instructions and returned to him by the 1st day of October following, and may be accompanied by such statements, exhibts, or other information, in addition to that required by this act, as may be deemed useful to the proper understanding of the same.

SEC. 4. That on the return of said estimates the Secretary shall have them classified, arranged, and published in quarto form; and there shall be printed and bound, in addition to the usual number for the use of Congress, not more than five hundred copies for the use of the Executive Departments, to be distributed by said Secretary; and the copies for the use of Congress shall be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives in time for distribution at the commencement of each session.

SEC. 5. That whenever an estimate shall be submitted for any specific expenditure for a light-house, custom-house, post-office, fort, river, harbor, or other public work or improvement, every such estimate shall be accompanied by a detailed estimate of the whole cost of the work; and all subsequent estimates for any such work shall show the originally estimated cost and the whole amount previously appropriated. And where a subsequent estimate shall ask for an appropriation beyond the originally estimated cost, the reason for the excess and the anticipated amount thereof shall be fully stated.

SEC. 6. That whenever the estimates for salaries, contingent or current and ordinary expenses exceed the amounts appropriated for the preceding fiscal year, either in the details or the aggregate, they shall be accompanied by concise notes, pointing out and explaining the differences.

SEC. 7. That estimates for contingent, incidental, or miscellaneous expenses shall in no case include salaries or compensation of any kind whatever; but where the number of permanent employés specifically authorized by law shall prove inadequate, such additional number as may be required shall be estimated for in the general estimate for salaries of the Department or office requiring the additional number, and all such estimates shall be indicated by inserting the word "submitted" in lieu of the date of the authorizing act hereinbefore required to be given.

SEC. 8. That all estimates for increase of salaries shall be indicated in the manner prescribed in the preceding section for additional employés, whether the increase is over the amount authorized by law or the amount fixed in the last appropriation act; and every such estimate shall be accompanied by a brief statement of the reasons for said increase.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary shall include in said estimates a statement of all permanent appropriations, both specific and indefinite, made by acts passed at any former session of Congress and remaining in force, with a proper reference to the volume of the statutes containing the same; and if it is believed any expenditures will be made under the same during the year for which the estimates are intended, there shall be given the same details, information, and references as are required in the case of other estimates.

SEC 10. That the said Secretary shall add to the estimates a classified statement showing the expenditures by appropriations for the four preceding fiscal years. He shall also add a classified statement showing the unexpended balance of each appropriation at the commencement of the fiscal year in which the estimates are made, the amounts appropriated for that year, the repayments in excess of expenditures during the first quarter, the gross amounts available for expenditure, the amounts expended during the first quarter, the estimated amounts required for the remaining three quarters, and the amounts which may be carried into the general Treasury.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary shall designate the title by which all appropriations shall be known, and such title so designated shall be the title under which estimates and expenditures shall thereafter be made. All specific appropriations for any building, fort, light-house, or other public work or improvement, whether for the original construction or for alterations, improvements, repairs, or grounds, shall be estimated for and expended under a general head applicable to the whole work; and there shall be but one appropriation account kept for each general object or particular building, fort, light-house, or other public work or improvement; and for the information of those concerned the Secretary may cause to be compiled and printed the appropriations made by law in such form as he may deem best.

SEC. 12. That in case any appropriation shall be made by Congress without having been submitted in the estimates of the said Secretary, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury thereon until a certified copy of the act making the appropriation shall have been sent to him and he shall have indorsed thereon the title by which the said appropriations shall be known; and all titles of appropriations shall convey a clear and concise idea of the general object for which the appropriations were made, and any further estimates for the same general object shall be submitted and the appropriation expended under the title thus established.

SEC. 13. That whenever Congress shall pass any relief act or resolution, payment under which is directed to be made out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, payment shall be made out of general indefinite appropriations upon the books relating to the accounts of the Department properly chargeable with the expenditure, for "payments under relief acts;" and a detailed statement of the payments under these accounts for the preceding fiscal year, with references to the acts and resolutions, by date, volume, page, and chapter or number, shall be printed in the estimates.

SEC. 14. That all acts of Congress directing the head of any Department or any commissioner or board to examine and settle, or pay, any account or claim against the United States, shall be construed to require the same to be done through the proper accounting officers, the same in all respects as if the said accounting officers were mentioned in the act, and payment shall be made in such manner as to charge the amount against the Department, and out of the revenues, properly chargeable with the expenditure.

SEC. 15. That all judgments of the Court of Claims shall be paid from the regular appropriation for the payment of judgments of said court, through the proper accounting officers, in such manner as to charge the amount against the Department properly chargeable with the expenditure.

SEC. 16. That where statements, exhibits, explanations, or other information accompanying estimates, are more elaborate than would be convenient for insertion in their proper place in the body of the work, they may be revised, condensed, printed in the appendix with proper references thereto, or transmitted to Congress in manuscript, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem best. And where, in the opinion of the Secretary, an estimate is not sufficiently explicit, or does not comply with law or the regulations thereunder, he may return the same for such corrections or alterations as may be necessary.

SEC. 17. That whenever, in the settlement of the account of any disbursing officer, clerk, or agent, it is found that he has drawn money from one appropriation and disbursed it on account of expenses properly chargeable to another, the accounting officers shall credit and charge the amount in the account of said officer, clerk, or agent under the correct appropriations, and transfer the same to a general account with the proper Department, to be known as the "transfer account," which latter account shall be closed monthly by warrant and counter-warrant, so far as the same can be done under existing and available appropriations. Said transfer, when practicable, shall include all vouchers presented, whether they are allowed or suspended, and shall be made in such manner as to debit the officer, clerk, or agent under the appropriations out of which the vouchers, when perfected, may be allowed. A statement of the unclosed balances in said transfer accounts, at the close of each fiscal year, shall be printed in the estimates.

SEC. 18. That nothing in the preceding section shall be construed to authorize any transfer of appropriations, or the advance of money from one general object of appropriation for disbursement on account of expenses properly chargeable to another, and all such transfers and advances are hereby prohibited: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may make advances to paymasters on foreign stations, or on a cruise, from the appropriations for "pay of the Navy," to be used for general disbursements on account of expenses; but in every such case the paymaster shall make monthly returns of his disbursements out of the money thus advanced to the Fourth Auditor, in such form as said Auditor shall prescribe, showing the proper appropriations to which the same should be charged; and upon such returns the Auditor shall make the transfer provided for in the preceding section.

SEC. 19. That it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States, whenever he shall forward or deliver any draft or warrant in favor of any disbursing officer, clerk, or agent, who is to be charged and held accountable for the money authorized to be drawn thereby, to send with said draft or warrant, or to the officer, clerk, or agent who is to be charged and held accountable for the money, a printed or written letter setting forth the appropriations from which the money is advanced and the amount from each. Said letter shall also contain the last preceding and this section of this act, and any person violating any of the provisions of these two sections shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $100 for each and every offense.

SEC. 20. That, for the purpose of settling the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States, there shall be an appropriation account on the proper books of the Treasury Department, to be known as the "unavailable balances" account, from and to which all unavailable balances, except of lapsed appropriations, shall be transferred by warrants, based upon the proper settlement of the First Auditor, confirmed by the First Comptroller. And all such transfers heretofore made, other than by warrants, including the amounts deposited with the States, shall be examined, stated, and transferred as herein directed. But all such transfers shall be made in such a manner as to debit the person or State properly chargeable therewith upon the personal-account books of the Department.

SEC. 21. That when money standing to the credit of a disbursing officer, clerk, or agent shall be repaid into the Treasury as "outstanding liabilities," under the provisions of the act of May 2, 1866, it shall be covered and credited upon the books of the office in which the officer, clerk, or agent was charged when the advance was made to him; and the Register of the Treasury shall furnish to the Second, Third, Fourth, and Sixth Auditors a transcript of all amounts heretofore covered into the Treasury as repayments of amounts standing to the credit of disbursing officers, clerks, or agents who are charged on their books, respectively; and hereafter each of said Auditors shall keep an "outstanding liabilities" account for the repayments herein referred to on the books of their respective offices in the manner prescribed in the said act.

SEC. 22. That in order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to keep an accurate account of the several loans of the United States, there may be kept on the books of the Department an appropriation account, to be known as the "premium and discount account," which shall be charged with the discount and credited with the premium hereafter accruing on loans in conformity with law; and all loans which have heretofore been sold at a premium or discount may be credited or charged, as the case may require, with the amount thereof, and the amount thus credited or charged shall be carried to the account herein authorized: Provided, That the said Secretary may direct a separate account to be kept both of premium and discount on each loan, if in his judgment it is desirable so to do.

SEC. 23. That whenever Congress shall authorize the issue of bonds, or other evidences of debt, in satisfaction of any claim against the United States, or for which no money shall be received, it shall be the duty of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to cause an account therefor to be settled in the usual manner, and the amount found due to be paid to the Treasurer of the United States, to be by him deposited in the general Treasury as a subscription on account of said bonds or other evidences of debt. And all cases of this character which have heretofore occurred may be examined and settled in such manner as to enable an exact statement of the public debt of the United States to be made from the warrant account of receipts and expenditures; and the monthly publication of the statement of the public debt of the United States shall be continued in such numbers as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem advisable.

SEC. 24. That in all cases where money has been or shall be erroneously covered into the Treasury of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority, by warrant and deposit, to correct said erroneous entry, charging the amount to a general appropriation account, to be known as "transfer of moneys erroneously covered." But nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the payment from the Treasury of any moneys thus erroneously covered without specific authority of law.

SEC. 25. That all proceeds of sales of old material, condemned stores, supplies, or other public property of any kind, after deducting the necessary expenses of sale, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous revenues derived from the "proceeds of Government property," and shall not be withdrawn or applied except in consequence of a subsequent appropriation made by law; and a detailed statement of all such proceeds of sales shall be included in the estimates. But this section shall not be held to repeal the existing authority of law in relation to marine hospitals, revenue-cutters, Navy pension fund, prize-money, or the clothing fund of the Navy, nor to prohibit the return to the proper appropriation of the proceeds of authorized sales of materials, stores, or supplies to officers and men of the Army and Navy, to exploring or surveying expeditions, or to the Indian service. And it shall be the duty of the Register of the Treasury to furnish to the proper accounting officers copies of all warrants covering such proceeds, where the same may be necessary in the settlement of accounts in their respective offices.

SEC. 26. That nothing in the preceding section shall be construed to authorize the retention and re-use of moneys derived from sales of public property of any kind whatever, by disbursing officers or others, but all such moneys shall be immediately deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, on the proper account, without other abatement than the necessary expenses of sale: Provided, That in cases where officers in charge of public property are stationed at such remote distances from a legal depository for public moneys as to render the expense of depositing the proceeds of sales unusually large, the Secretary of the Treasury may, on the request of the head of the proper Department, and by a special order, authorize said officer to retain and re-use such proceeds of sales, but all such special orders shall continue in force only to the close of the fiscal year in which they are issued. And all officers thus authorized shall render to the proper Auditor, at the close of each quarter, a statement of all moneys thus received and retained, upon which statement he shall be charged and held accountable under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may approve.

SEC. 27. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall in June of each year transmit to the head of each Department a statement of the balances of appropriations for the service of his Department, which shall appear by the books of the Register of the Treasury to be unexpended at the close of business on the last day of May.

SEC. 28. That on receipt of said statement the head of the Department to whom it is sent shall cause to be certified thereon how much of each unexpended balance will be required to meet outstanding liabilities properly chargeable thereto, and how much thereof may be carried into the general Treasury; and said statement, thus certified, shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury within fifteen days after its receipt.

SEC. 29. That upon the return of said statements the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue his warrants thereon, directing all amounts which it appears from them "may be carried into the general Treasury," to be charged to the proper appropriations, and credited to the general account of appropriations as surplus funds; and all amounts thus disposed of shall remain in the Treasury like other unappropriated money, and shall not be transferred, withdrawn, applied, or used except in consequence of subsequent specific authority of law.

SEC. 30. That all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury without being drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years from the date of the last appropriation made by law, shall be reported by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st day of June in each year, to the accounting officers whose duty it is to settle accounts thereunder, and said accounting officers shall examine the records of their respective offices, and certify to the Secretary whether said balances, or any part of either of them, will be required in the settlement of pending accounts. If it shall appear that such balances, or any part of either of them, will not be required for this purpose, the said Secretary may include in his warrants the amounts not so required, whether the head of the proper Department shall have certified that it "may be carried into the general treasury" or not. But no appropriation for the payment of the interest or principal of the public debt, or to which Congress may have given a longer duration by law, shall be thus treated. A statement of the amounts carried into the Treasury as surplus funds during the preceding fiscal year shall be included in the estimates.

"SEC. 31. That it shall not be lawful for any department of the Government to expend for the service of any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that year, or to involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations. And it shall be the duty of the several officers of the Government having executive control of appropriations, to provide for such supervision of the appropriations under their direction as shall secure the proper observance of the provisions of this section; and any person violating its provisions, or the regulations thereunder, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $100 for each and every offense.

SEC. 32. That all annual salaries, compensation, pay, or commutation, to persons in the service of the United States, shall be computed and paid on the following basis: When payable quarterly, one-fourth of the annual sum; when payable monthly, one-twelfth of the annual sum; and when payment is to be made for a less period than one month, it shall be, as nearly as practicable, on the basis of a per diem compensation at the rate of one three hundred and sixty-fifth of the annual sum: Provided, That no variation in these rules shall be made on account of leap-year: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may direct that any quarterly salary be made payable monthly. And the said Secretary shall cause to be prepared and printed tables upon the foregoing basis, including per diem pay at various rates, which, when published, shall be the rule in all branches of the Government, for the payment of per diem, monthly, quarterly, and annual salaries, compensation, pay, or commutation.

SEC. 33. That whenever application shall be made to any Department of the Government for copies of papers, documents, or records, on file therein, by any person other than a Government officer, agent, or employé, requiring the same for official use, said copies shall be furnished on payment of the following fees: Written copies, twenty-five cents per one hundred words; printed blanks, filled up, fifteen cents per page; photographic copies, the estimated cost of making them; certificates under seal, fifty cents each. And original papers shall only be removed from the files of one Department for use in some other Department, or by United States officers before the courts; and in the latter case photographic copies where it is practicable, and certified copies where it is not, shall be placed in the files in lieu and until the return of said originals. But copies, or originals, of any kind shall only be furnished when in the opinion of the head of the Department it is consistent with the public interests so to do; and the heads of the several Departments may make such rules as they shall think necessary not inconsistent herewith, under which said copies and originals will be furnished, and all moneys received from this source shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous revenue received from "copies of papers and records."

SEC. 34. That, except where otherwise provided, the Secretary of the Treasury may make all needful regulations for carrying this act into effect, and all such regulations not inconsistent with the provisions hereof, when approved and promulgated by the said Secretary, shall have the force and effect of law.

SEC. 35. That this act shall be in effect from and after June 30, 1873, and may be referred to and quoted as the "estimates act of 1873."

SEC. 36. That the following acts and parts of acts and resolutions and parts of resolutions are hereby repealed, but anything to be done to complete business already commenced may be continued to completion under the statutes hereby repealed. And the references to laws hereby repealed are to the same as contained

DISPOSITION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to give notice to the Senate that on Tuesday next, if the business before the Senate will permit, and if not, as soon thereafter as it may, I shall ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 2, to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida. If it be the pleasure of the Senate at that time, I will submit a few remarks upon the bill.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 352) to amend an act granting a pension to Sarah S. Cooper; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of William Talbert; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 354) for the relief of Moore N. Falls; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 355) for the relief of James Millinger, of New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 356) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1872; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 357) to establish certain post-roads in Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to beprinted.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of James Roberts and others be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of James V. Baughner be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That John S. Hall, claimant for a pension, have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Arent B. Sorenson be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the executors of Thomas Hard have leave to withdraw their petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Lawrence P. N. Landrum be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas it is provided by section 3 of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, that all lands granted by said act "which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other lands, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, to be paid to said company:"

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire at what date said road was completed; if the time fixed in said section has commenced to run, and at what time, and if it has expired; if any action has been taken under said provision of law if the time has expired, and what further legislation, if any, is necessary to carry said law into effect; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The Committee on Appropriations reported the joint resolution with an amendment to strike out the provisos in the following words:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited: And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, the resolution ought not to pass without my making some statement in regard to it. It is to cover the semi-annual interest upon the 3.65 bonds issued under the act of June 30, 1874, by which act the Government of the United States became pledged to take care that provision was made for the payment of the interest as it fell due, and ultimately for the payment of the principal of the bonds.

The condition of things is precisely this: At the last session of Congress a direct appropriation out of the Treasury was made for the first six months' interest on these bonds. That has been paid; but the six months' interest which falls due on the first day of next month has not been provided for. When the appropriation was made last year, it was thought that Congress would convene in time to consider this question, and so but six months' interest was provided for. Now the question is on appropriating for the six months' interest just about to fall due.

Well, sir, it has been asked why do not the commissioners pay this themselves. The answer on the part of the commissioners is that, though Congress made an appropriation for the general expenses of the District government last year amounting to something less than a million of dollars, they directed the commissioners that that should be applied to the current expenses of the government; and though the commissioners have funds enough in their hands, which are not now demanded, for the payment of this interest, yet they do not feel themselves authorized to appropriate them to this specific purpose. So that it has become necessary either to make an appropriation directly out of the Treasury of the United States for the payment of this interest or to authorize or direct the commissioners to pay it out of the funds in their hands for current expenses.

It will be seen by the joint resolution that it comes to us in the shape of a direction to the commissioners to pay it out of the funds in their hands either arising from the appropriation made by Congress at the last session or arising from the revenues of the District, taxation, &c.; and that is the precise proposition now before the Senate. It will be seen, if attention is given to the subject, that the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate have proposed an amendment, and I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment, that I may call the attention of the Senate to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The reported amendment was to strike out the following provisos:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited: And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any of such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senate has already acted upon that amendment; but still, as I made no explanation of it at the time, I think the Senate ought to act upon the final passage of the joint resolution with a knowledge of the whole facts.

This joint resolution is simply directing the payment of this interest out of any funds in the hands of the commissioners. It did not occur to the committee that it was not worth while to embarrass the joint resolution by any extrinsic statement—any statement not properly involved in that act itself. It will be seen, if you look at the resolution, that two things are proposed by the amendment. First:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited.

The first suggestion in regard to that is that it is utterly incompatible with the obligation of the Government. By the acts of 1874 and 1875 a board of audit was created to audit the liabilities of the District created by the board of public works. That was a board created by Congress. That was their duty, and in the performance of that duty they have made an audit, and upon that audit they were to issue certificates, and upon the issue of those certificates they were to be carried into bonds. The board of audit was of our own choosing.

It was composed of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury. They went on and audited the claims. The sum total of that audit as already carried into bonds is $13,412,500. They have audited further and carried into certificates which are convertible into bonds $914,540.05.

Mr. MORTON. Are all the accounts already filed and audited?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They are not all audited. Now it will be seen that if that proviso is retained "that any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited," these accounts which have been carried into certificates, and now only wait the action of the commissioners to carry them into bonds, will be entirely suspended. It seems to me, and it seemed to the committee unanimously, that that was incompatible and inconsistent with the obligations of the Government, and does not necessarily arise on this question.

The next proposition is:

And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

The committee recommend the striking out of that on two grounds First, it would seem to carry an implication with it that that thing has been done. The committee have no knowledge or belief that it has been, and, as it is not germane to this proposition, there did not seem to be any fitness in it. At any rate it was not a subject before us for investigation, and, without having any evidence before us on that subject, it did not seem to us that it was a proper thing to do.

Now, Mr. President, I am inquired of whether this statement of $13,412,500 carried into bonds, and $914,540.05 of certificates, covers the entire indebtedness that has been audited or whether the entire indebtedness has been audited. That does cover the entire audit of the board of audit, as I understand, and as certified to me in the paper I have in my hand.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Maine, if this amendment prevails, striking out the limitation, what he understands will be the limitation upon the power of these commissioners to issue 3.65 bonds?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It will be precisely commensurate with their authority, which is unlimited I understand.

Mr. DAWES. Very likely it will be so commensurate; but that does not answer my question. I inquired of the Senator what he understood to be the limit of their authority.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Their authority is unlimited, and can only be limited by the extent of the subject-matter to be presented by them.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly; with great pleasure.

Mr. DAWES. Am I to understand the Senator that the commissioners of the District of Columbia have unlimited power to issue 3.65 bonds, which I see in the papers are generally construed to be not only bonds the interest of which is guaranteed by the Government, but are to all intents and purposes United States bonds, for which the United States is responsible? Am I to understand the Senator from Maine to say that the power of these commissioners to make such a bond is unlimited, if we adopt this amendment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not quite. The Senator does not state me quite accurately. I say that their power is unlimited except as to its application to the particular subject. It is limited to this extent: they have authority to audit all the claims that arise under contracts made by the former board of public works. In that sense it is limited; it is limited to that; but upon all that class of contracts it is unlimited——

Mr. DAWES. Has the progress of the work or function of this commission extended so far as to enable the Senator to answer this question: About what amount, if that be the case, is it in their power to issue?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was just proceeding, if the honorable Senator had not interrupted me, of which I do not complain, to state what I suppose will be the probable limit. I have already stated what has been audited. Now what remains? The board of audit reported yesterday the ascertained amount of certificates to be issued for claims audited but not certified to be $156,851.05. Also, they report an estimate of unaudited claims falling under that general specification, $203,750.99, and amount due on contracts withheld for test of work, $150,000, making in all $510,602.04. This will complete all unfinished contracts of the board of public works held by the commission to be valid. What will be the result if there be no limitation? And the proviso, it will be seen, is not a limitation on their power; it is only, as the committee supposed, raising a suspicion that there had been some indiscreet or corrupt exercise of power; and the question to which the Senator from Massachusetts adverts, and to which I am now speaking, of the limitation of power, may properly come in; I do not say as to that; but this computation of figures leaves this result: Including the audited certificates awaiting to be carried into bonds, together with the estimates of probable claims to be audited and carried into certificates, the whole sum will be this: Already issued into bonds, $14,327,040.05; to which add the items I have specified, and the result will be $14,978,893.33—a fraction short of $15,000,000.

Mr. SARGENT. It seems to me that it would be the part of wisdom for us to incorporate a proviso in this bill that the amount of bonds issued and hereafter to be issued shall not exceed $15,000,000. There is a substantial limit. The issue now amounts to over $14,900,000. Let us fix it at $15,000,000, which leaves a margin for a mistake in the estimate, and then the board of audit can go on and complete their work and the persons who hold these certificates may convert them into bonds according to the original legislation, and we are not then under the apprehension that we may wake up some morning and find that the issue amounts to twenty or twenty-five millions.

As I understand, the original bill reported by the House committee contained a limitation of that nature. I of course have no right to state what occurred in committee; but my recollection is that this point was favorably considered by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. Of course I speak under correction of the recollection of the chairman, who officially presents the matter to the Senate. I know the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] thinks that an amendment of that kind should go upon the bill, and so do several other members of the committee with whom I have conversed. I would suggest that such an amendment ought to be incorporated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not the slightest objection to a limitation on the amount of the bonds. I am not talking about that question. I was endeavoring to explain why the committee thought it was not wise to adopt the second proviso of the House resolution; and it was that it seemed to carry an implication that the commissioners had, very likely inadvertently or in some other way, issued more bonds than were authorized; and as we had no means of examining that question—and certainly an implication does arise from that language—and we had no time, even if we had the opportunity, to examine it, between this and the necessity for passing this bill it seemed to the committee that it was advisable to strike that out.

So far as the proposed limitation in this bill to fifteen millions is concerned, let me say that in that respect the bill is identically as it came from the House of Representatives to the Senate. There was no limitation of amount in the bill which came to the Senate from the House, and the bill, as it now stands, the Senate having passed upon the amendment striking out these provisos, is simply for the payment of the interest upon these bonds. Now, if my honorable friend from Iowa desires to make an amendment to limit it as to the amount which in any event shall be issued, of course I have no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. In accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from California, I offer an amendment limiting the amount of these bonds to fifteen millions, and I should like to say a word upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One word before the Senator proceeds. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter of the commissioners of the District, containing the figures which I gave to the Senate.

No objection being made, the following letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 25, 1876.

SIR: We have the honor to advise as follows:

Certificates actually issued by the board of audit at this date, as reported by said board, converted and convertible into 3.65 bonds..	$14,327,040 05
Three-sixty-five bonds actually issued at this date by the sinking-fund commissioners, as reported by them, in the redemption of certificates of the board of audit	13,412,500 00
Outstanding certificates of the board of audit, convertible into 3.65 bonds, as above	914,540 05

The above $914,540.05 is the amount of certificates of the board of audit not presented by the owners for conversion into 3.65 bonds.

The board of audit reports on this date the ascertained amount of certificates to be issued for claims audited but not certified to be	$156,851 05
Also, estimate of unaudited claims of all classes	203,750 99
And amount due on contracts withheld for test of work	150,000 00
Making in all before the board of audit	510,602 04
Completing all unfinished contracts of the board of public works held by the commissioners to be valid	97,000 00
Construction of the western market-house, contracted for by the late government	44,251 24
Making the ascertained and estimated amount of certificates to be issued convertible into 3.65 bonds	651,853 28
Add certificates already issued	14,327,040 05
Making a total sum of	14,978,893 33

which is the whole amount of 3.65 bonds actually issued and to be issued under the act of June 20, 1874.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
S. L. PHELPS,
Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. LOT M. MORRILL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say one word with reference to this issue of 3.65 bonds. I think the commissioners of the District of Columbia totally misapprehended the law under which they were created, and that they have enlarged the debt of this District far beyond the authority given in the act of their creation. They misconstrued the act organizing this commission by legalizing all the contracts of the board of public works or most of them. It was never the intention of the committee who reported that bill to legalize those contracts. On the contrary, it was supposed that the act creating the board of commissioners expressly excluded that idea. But there were certain contracts then uncompleted, for sewerage and paving certain squares in particular streets, that the committee supposed ought to be completed in order to make the work already done of value and to protect and preserve such work. Therefore they authorized this board of commissioners only to preserve and protect the work already begun by the board of public works and in process of completion, and not to enter upon new work.

When these commissioners made their report last year, which I have before me, they reported the total issue of bonds under the act of June 20, 1874, at $2,088,168.73. They also reported outstanding certificates to the amount of $4,770,558.45, making a total of $6,858,727.18 at the date of their annual report of last year, or on the 5th December, 1874. Now, between this date and the date of their report for this year, laid upon our tables a few days ago, this board of commissioners have expended $4,235,841.96 upon the streets and sewers, &c., in this city, and they construe the act of June 20, 1874, as authorizing them to do so. I do not believe a fair construction of that act does authorize it. I think they have totally misapprehended their authority and enlarged their jurisdiction, and have incurred obligations here which they had no right to incur under the law.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator read that part of the act?

Mr. ALLISON. The act of 1874?

Mr. MORTON. The act the Senator is now referring to which they have misconstrued.

Mr. ALLISON. Before I read that act I desire to call attention to the fact that under the old organization of the District of Columbia there were two distinct corporations in this District, one known as the government of the District of Columbia proper, and the other known as the board of public works; and in this act we undertook to distinguish between these two different corporations, and we did authorize these commissioners to execute valid contracts of the District government, but we excluded the idea that they should execute any and all contracts made by the independent and distinct corporation having the control of the streets and known as the board of public works. Therefore the act giving authority to these commissioners provides:

But said commission, in the exercise of such power or authority, shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed, at the time of the passage of this act.

It was not intended that this board of District commissioners should go on and carry out the numberless contracts that were then floating about this city made by the board of public works. Certainly if Congress had ever anticipated such a construction they would not have authorized the issuance of a large amount of bonds upon this District and pledged the faith of the nation for the payment of the interest and the principal at maturity. As evidence of that I call attention to the report of the committee, made at the time, making an estimate of the amount of money necessary to complete those contracts begun and not completed. The total estimate was $1,325,911.62 only. Now, they have expended nearly $5,000,000 under this estimate.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know at that point from the Senator, what was the intention in the instance of a street the improvement of which had commenced, the pavement of which had been carried to a certain point; so that if it stopped there it would be of no avail? Was it intended that they should merely protect and preserve that by covering it up, seeing that it did not get wet, or the like, or that they should go on and complete it?

Mr. ALLISON. It was intended in the case stated by the Senator, where for instance a street had been paved from Ninth to Tenth, if you please, and from Twelfth to Eighteenth, that the intervening point should be paved also; but it was not contemplated that all the streets and the roads leading into the city of Washington and about the city of Washington which had not been improved or upon which no improvements had been made under contracts with the board of public works should be completed. It was only intended that so much of this work should be done as was necessary to protect and preserve the work already begun.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Iowa within what period of time has this amount of five millions been expended; between what dates?

Mr. ALLISON. I have before me the report of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and find that this year, from November 30, 1874, to November 30, 1875, there has been expended $4,235,000 for the streets, sewers, &c.

Mr. BAYARD. In the city of Washington?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAGIN. Expended for what? Will the Senator tell?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from New Hampshire will take Executive Document No. 1, part 7, he will find the details; curbing, planking, sodding, graveling, grading, blue-rock pavement, Belgian pavement, McAdam pavement, wood pavement, concrete pavement, resurfacing concrete, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. ALLISON. Page 254. Of course a portion of this is for sewerage also.

Mr. DAWES. If it does not interrupt the Senator from Iowa, I should like to have him inform me, if he can, in what particular this board of commissioners have modified or curtailed the system of improvements, as it was called, that was begun and carried on upon such a magnificent and alarming scale by their predecessors?

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I am not able to state in detail what this board of commissioners have done.

Mr. DAWES. Can the Senator do me the favor to point to any particular, if he cannot the whole, in which they have modified or curtailed in system, in plan, in expenditure the operations of their predecessors, to whom they succeeded by the repeal of the act which created their predecessors?

Mr. ALLISON. They have, so far as I understand it, only modified in this sense: they have changed the grade, in some instances, so as to make the cost of the work less. I do not know in what other respect they have modified. I only know that they have expended over $5,000,000 upon the streets, and alleys, and public places in this District when it was not contemplated they should expend this large sum by the act re-organizing the government of the District of Columbia and creating this board of commissioners.

I only mention that with a view of entering my protest against the method of administering this law, having had some part in framing the law originally. But I do not by this statement wish to throw any doubt upon these 3.65 bonds, because I take it that this work has already been done and the 3.65 bonds paid out. Therefore there is an obligation resting upon us, we having created this board of commissioners and their having mistaken their authority. I do not charge upon them any intentional wrong; but they have incurred this obligation under, as I believe, a mistaken view of the law of their creation. But there it is facing us. They are our own officers. Now suppose we declare these 3.65 bonds unauthorized, in what position are we then? We shall then be under obligation, I take it, to pay the contractors and the men who have performed this work in money, dollar for dollar, whereas the bonds have been received by them at the rate of seventy cents on the doliar. Therefore I believe this limitation that has been proposed is absolutely essential in order that this board of commissioners may not in the year that is to come further enlarge and amplify their jurisdiction and create another debt of another $5,000,000 for us to appropriate money here to pay the interest upon next year.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I understood him to say just now that these bonds were received at the rate of seventy cents on the dollar. Does he mean to say they were received at that rate, or does he mean to say that they are only worth that?

Mr. ALLISON. I mean to say that as I understand these contracts they were made with these various parties, and the persons performing the work were paid in 3.65 bonds at their par value, and that these 3.65 bonds are only worth now in the market seventy cents on the dollar. That is all I meant to say in reference to that. I think this limitation is an important limitation, and that it ought to be placed on these bonds; and I make the limitation fifteen millions in order that all the accounts which have already been audited may be passed into the 3.65 bonds and a final adjustment and settlement, it is hoped, of this whole matter be reached.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has made a statement which naturally will excite attention. I always dislike to hear statements asserting that officers of the Government have issued bonds or made contracts in violation of law or assumed to exercise powers not conferred upon them by law; but they should not be made lightly. The Senator makes and repeats such a statement in a very strong way, so as to charge that these officers have at least mistaken the law to the extent of authorizing the issue of two or three or four million dollars of bonds without authority of law. If this be so, there is no language too severe to cast on those gentlemen who by their mistake have involved the Government of the United States and the people of this District in a liability so large as this. It is a serious charge to make against these persons, and will have a serious effect on the credit of these securities for a time, and a still more serious effect upon the tax-payers of this District, if they have to pay these bonds issued in violation of law.

Now I ask Senators to listen to the law. These District commissioners are the creation of Congress, the honorable Senator himself participating in framing the law which created them. They are in the nature of corporators, a body corporate, to govern for the time being the District of Columbia, to exercise the powers conferred by certain laws, upon certain previous authorities for the government of the District. My colleague, who is a good lawyer, and my friend from Iowa, who is another, and the able committee who framed the law, of which they were members, certainly could not express the powers more clearly than they have in the language of this law. After first creating this board of commissioners to be appointed by the President, and giving them all the powers of the previous government organized in this District, the law provides:

But said commissions, in the exercise of such power or authority, shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other—other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District.

Now here are the exceptions—

That is No. 1. The next exception is—to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts.

That is, they have the power to enforce and carry into execution existing legal obligations and contracts, such contracts and obligations as existed on the 20th of June, 1874. Now, sir, does not this, in the clearest language that can possibly be expressed in a statute, give them the authority to pass upon what are existing legal contracts and liabilities? Does it not necessarily throw upon them the responsibility of saying what are legal contracts? And it gave to aid them in their construction of what are legal contracts two eminent financial officers of the Government, without whose assent no contract could be ratified and no money paid upon any existing contract.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask whether the provision which the Senator has just read confers authority upon this board of commissioners to repave a whole street and with the proceeds of 3.65 bonds pay for that repaving?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know enough about that——

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather finish what little I have to say.

Mr. HARVEY. I simply rise to state that, while I dislike to interrupt the discussion, I feel impelled to call attention to the fact that the morning hour has expired and the proper time arrived to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being Senate bill No. 34. It is evident that this matter cannot be determined within a reasonable time, and, the bill to which I refer having been pretty thoroughly discussed, I think a vote upon it will soon be reached.

Mr. SARGENT. I think my friend had better allow us half an hour for the measure reported by the Committee on Appropriations. This interest falls due on the 1st of February; the time is dangerously near. The question ought to be acted upon to-day by the Senate and by the House during this week certainly.

Mr. HARVEY. If I can have an understanding that at the end of half an hour the unfinished business shall be taken up, I will not interpose.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend from Kansas to allow this debate to proceed, with the understanding that it is subject to a call for the regular order at any time. I have no doubt we can soon dispose of this.

Mr. HARVEY. If that understanding can be had, I will abstain for half an hour from calling up the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kansas that he is correct in supposing that the morning hour has expired; but the Chair was allowing the discussion on the other measure to run on by common consent.

Mr. HARVEY. I am satisfied, from what I hear around me, that it is impossible to settle the question under discussion this morning in half an hour more, and I therefore insist on the call for the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope that will not be done. The honorable Senator from Kansas will perceive that there is urgent necessity for present action on this subject to save the credit of the Government on these bonds. The matter which my honorable friend has in charge, although of importance, is not of immediate, pressing importance. Therefore I trust he will allow this matter to take precedence. I cannot anticipate that it will consume a great deal of time.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to make a suggestion to him, and that is that by unanimous consent we pass by the order of the day informally, subject to his right to call it up at any moment, leaving it in his discretion; and then he may let this debate go on half an hour, or an hour, just as he sees fit?

Mr. MORTON. The result of that will be that you will not finish either bill to-day.

Mr. HARVEY. The difficulty is that it brings up other questions to distract the attention of the Senate from the question that has now been under consideration for two days, and about which I think Senators have very generally made up their minds. I therefore feel bound to call for the regular order, and I hope the friends of the bill which has been under consideration for two days will stand by it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas calls for the regular order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday, and that bill is before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I feel that I shall not have discharged my duty unless I try to keep before the Senate the matter under consideration this morning. I therefore move——

Mr. INGALLS. It may be that a vote can be immediately taken on the pending bill, and, unless some Senator desires to continue the discussion further, I would suggest that by taking the vote the whole question can be disposed of, and then the bill before the Senate on the report of the Committee on Appropriations can be considered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Of course I would not make the motion I now contemplate if that could be done.

Mr. INGALLS. I certainly have no desire to discuss the matter further myself, and I do not know that any of the friends of the bill have.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I ought to say that my immediate neighbor usually, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] who has an amendment pending in which we all know he is deeply interested, is out of the Senate at this moment.

Mr. HARVEY. I thought his amendment was voted down.

Mr. CONKLING. O, no. I think he called for the yeas and nays on it, and the question of ordering them has not been decided.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me refer to the RECORD. The Senator from Wisconsin said:

> I shall have to insist upon dividing the Senate upon my own amendment unless somebody will submit an amendment which is more satisfactory to those who advertise themselves as the friends of the bill, and who are accepted as the friends of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. What the Senator from Kansas has read from the RECORD confirms me. It shows that the Senator from Wisconsin demanded a division of the Senate. I do not know of any way of dividing the Senate in that sense, except by a call of the yeas and nays. I call attention to the fact that he is absent, and I think it would not be quite courteous for the rest of us to agree to some special arrangement by which, when he comes in, he may find himself too late.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am as anxious as any one can be to have the vote taken at an early moment on the bill pending yesterday; but I suggest, in view of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin is absent—and I suppose for some good reason—to the friends of that bill that it would be better that we proceed with the bill before the Senate this morning with the understanding that it is subject to a call at any time for the regular order. I suppose that my friend from Maine, who has that bill in charge, if he finds that it is to take much time or engross the entire time of the Senate to-day, will not insist upon excluding the bill that was under consideration yesterday; but that a reasonable time may be given the Senator from Wisconsin to get in, let the District bill be considered subject to a call for the regular order at any time, rather than antagonize this bill in its present shape, or as it may stand, with it. The Senator from Wisconsin being absent, of course there will be delay and debate, whereas I think we might as well proceed with the present bill unless we can take a vote on the bill of yesterday at once, and get it out of the way. I suppose the Senator from Maine would be quite willing, if the vote could be taken on that bill, to get it out of the way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Of course I would not consent to anything that would interrupt permanently the progress of this bill, for the Senate will see that it is of vast importance that it should be acted upon promptly, because on the 1st of February next comes the execution of the public faith or its failure, one or the other.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. One word. My colleague is not absent from the city, and I am advised that he will be in the Senate within half an hour or forty minutes. I would be pleased if the bill under consideration yesterday should not be taken up until he is in his seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas object to the continuance of the consideration of House joint resolution No. 52, subject to a call for the regular order?

Mr. HARVEY. I will simply say to the Senator from Iowa and to others who have made this suggestion of delay that I consider the object of this bill as one of the utmost importance; that no business before us can be of more importance. The Senator from Iowa remembers that the matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate several times, and delay has been asked for various reasons. The Senator from Wisconsin certainly must have known that under the rules this bill would be the regular order as the unfinished business of yesterday at one o'clock to-day. I feel, so far as I am concerned, unwilling to delay the matter any further. I feel that the bill is now before the Senate, having the right to consideration and action. I am satisfied that the Senator from Wisconsin will soon be in his seat.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask my friend from Kansas whether there is any special fact, that we do or do not know, which makes time and a little time essential and important about this land bill? For example, is there any fact which makes it of consequence whether the Senate shall act upon the bill now on the 27th of January, or shall act upon it on the 1st of February, the day before which provision must be made for the payment of this interest, if it is to be made at all? I do not know but there is; I inquire for information.

Mr. HARVEY. I will call attention to the fact that heretofore in all the States of this Union and the Territories traversed by land-grant railroads there are thousands of worthy citizens of the United States suffering a great wrong. This wrong has been continued for years despite the efforts of their friends to reach a remedy. It is quite as important to them as the payment of interest upon a few bonds can be either to the citizens of this District or to any capitalist who may have invested in such securities. I therefore think that it is asking too much to request us to further delay this bill when if a conclusion upon it is reached as it can soon be, the other matter, this District business, can be taken up and proceeded with.

It is for these reasons and for the reasons I alluded to before, and the fact that the matter has been discussed at such length and is now so thoroughly understood, that I feel anxious to reach a conclusion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 34 is before the Senate as the unfinished business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Inasmuch as I hardly think the Senate would like to go on in the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin, whose amendment is pending, and inasmuch as my honorable friend from Kansas does not choose to yield temporarily even, I feel constrained to make the motion that the pending and all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate continue the consideration of House joint resolution No. 52.

Mr. HARVEY. I hope that motion will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest that the postponement be until two o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is quarter past one now.

Mr. CONKLING. Would the motion suggested by the Senator from Ohio be in order?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the matter be postponed until two o'clock I will make no objection at that time to taking it up. It is only three-quarters of an hour off, and with all respect to the Senator from Kansas I think that those worthy settlers of whom he has spoken will not suffer materially during that three-quarters of an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to a postponement until two o'clock?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] is now in the Chamber.

Mr. HARVEY. I object. I knew the Senator from Wisconsin would be here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I withdraw the motion for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 917) to amend section 4898 of the Revised Statutes in relation to patents; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1042) fixing the rate of postage on third-class mail matter.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 10,000 copies of the report of the commission of engineers appointed to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation, with accompanying maps, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 8,000 for the use of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

An act (H. R. No. 626) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to naturalization; and

An act (H. R. No. 1561) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasurer of the United States.

LAND ENTRIES WITHIN RAILROAD GRANTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 34) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOWE to add to the first section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the title which the State of Wisconsin or its assigns may have to lands granted to that State by the act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856, and the acts amendatory thereof, but such title shall remain as valid as the same now is.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I stated yesterday, with as much candor and explicitness as I was capable of, just why I wanted some amendment of this kind made. I tried as well as I could by conference with gentlemen on the other side to arrange the form of the amendment. I told them what purpose I wished to accomplish. No Senator objected to that purpose except the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and I think after the statement he made he is not inclined to insist on his objection. I do not believe, in view of the history I stated here yesterday, that the Senate really means to deprive the State of Wisconsin of the advantage of that grant after all the work she has accomplished under most adverse circumstances to secure her right——

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. I want to learn something about this bill, of which I confess I am in ignorance to a great extent. If I understand the Senator's amendment, it seems to imply that this bill is intended to impair titles that exist under the laws of the United States, and that if we do not except Wisconsin from the operation of the bill titles in Wisconsin under the laws of the United States may be impaired by the provisions of this bill. I should like to know from the Senator or from the committee that reported this bill whether the object of the bill is to impair titles at all. In answer to a question that I have put in private they tell me it is not intended to impair any title; but the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin evidently goes upon the hypothesis that without excepting Wisconsin from the operation of the bill titles that exist under acts of Congress will be impaired. It is a very grave question if that is the real effect of this bill. If it is the intention of this bill to impair existing titles, to impair them by legislation, instead of having them decided upon by the courts, that is a very serious matter. But I understand the friends of the bill to say that this is not the object of the bill at all. I should like some light on that subject.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if the Senator wants to know what the purpose of the bill is, he should apply to those who move the bill. But there is a particular clause of the bill which, in my judgment, if it does not impair the title of the State of Wisconsin to certain lands within her limits, will authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to strip that State of a large body of lands which were granted to her in 1856 upon conditions therein named, which she has struggled earnestly from that time to this to comply with and has nearly complied with. She has built a very large portion of the roads which she was charged with the work of building, and has done that against some very hostile legislation of Congress itself, is trying to build the rest, and going on with it from year to year; but there is a clause in this bill, as I say, which, if it is passed in that shape, will authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to take that grant from her at any time and put the land into market. Only one Senator on this floor yesterday intimated that he thought that was proper, and that was the Senator from Ohio. I do not think he will insist upon it to-day.

But as I was about to say, there seemed to be a difference of opinion among the friends of the bill as to what particular form of words should be employed to save the State of Wisconsin from that operation. I wrote the amendment which is on the table. The Senator from California suggested another form. That was acceptable to me. The Senator from Minnesota suggested another form. That was acceptable to me. But some of the friends of the bill think one amendment less objectionable than another; they are not agreed among themselves as to which is the least objectionable, and we are in danger of falling, not exactly between two stools, but between three.

Mr. MORTON. I inquire of the Senator whether the time had expired in which the State was to perform the conditions of the grant?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I will further inquire whether the lands to which he refers are now held out at the Land Office as open to public entry?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. MORTON. Then the case does not come within the terms of the law.

Mr. HOWE. It does not come within the terms of the law as it stands, but there are two lines in this bill, the tenth and eleventh lines of the first section, which, if they shall become a law, as it seems to me, will authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office at once by order to put these lands into market. All I ask of you is that you shall put such language into the bill as will exclude that operation. If you do that, I am content as far as the State of Wisconsin is concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow me now to interrupt him. As he has twice alluded to a remark I made in regard to that section, I wish now to state again my position. I am clearly of the opinion that this act does not confer upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office any power that he does not possess now, because there is no pretense that this act gives to the Commissioner of the General Land Office any power whatever. It simply says that in a certain state of facts, one of the conditions-precedent of which is a certain order of the General Land Office, the settler shall have a patent for his land if all the proceedings have been regular. It does not authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office hereafter, without the authority of the President of the United States, without the proclamation of the President, without the sanction of the Secretary of the Interior, to place again subject to public sale land that has been once withdrawn. There is no pretense of that kind. I say as an affirmative proposition that I would vote for such a measure if it were here, and for this reason: The State of Wisconsin received a grant of land years ago and agreed to complete the road certainly before the 1st of January, 1876. The time has arrived; the road is not completed. The lands have been withheld from settlement for twenty years to enable her to comply with this grant. She has failed to do so. Now it seems to me there ought to be an authority in the Executive Department of the Government charged with the execution of the land laws to sell all the public lands not granted or specifically set aside. There ought to be power in the Executive of the United States to step in, in default of the State of Wisconsin, and offer this land again for public sale. This bill does not confer that authority, but it should be held by the Executive under the general authority of the land laws which authorize all public lands by proclamation of the President to be offered for entry and made subject to homestead and pre-emption. Under these general laws I believe that, in the case of a clear, palpable neglect of the State of Wisconsin to comply with the terms and conditions of the land grant, the executive authorities may step in and sell that land under the existing land laws; and I think that is right. But the power is not conferred by this bill.

Mr. MORTON. I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the language of the bill, to show that it is not obnoxious to the objection he specifies. It provides for securing the right of entry upon lands where the entries were made "prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated"—that I think we all will agree is right—"or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office."

The Senator says they have not been restored to market by order of the General Land Office. Then they are not open to entry, and therefore there is no necessity of protecting them by his amendment. But if after an order has been made by the Land Office here restoring those lands to public sale an entry is made in good faith by an actual settler, the Senator would hardly want to divest that title, the term of the grant having expired.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, I do not want to divest any title, and I do not want any title divested; and if it is the purpose of Senators to divest the State of Wisconsin of this title, just say so, and do it in plain language. I did not suppose yesterday that it was the purpose of anybody but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to do it. I am a little confused this morning on the point. In the case of a clear and palpable neglect, says the Senator from Ohio, the State ought to be divested of the title. Yes; but before you find a State of the Union guilty of a clear and palpable neglect you ought to have some evidence of it, which is not ordinarily found in a speech made on the floor of the Senate. What is the evidence of the clear and palpable neglect of the State of Wisconsin? She has not been able to build from four to five hundred miles of railway through a dense wilderness since 1856. She has built, as my colleague said yesterday to the Senate, about three hundred miles of that distance and is building yearly.

Mr. INGALLS. How often has the time been extended?

Mr. HOWE. It has been extended once, and the Senate has voted twice since to extend the time.

Mr. INGALLS. When did the term of the last extension expire?

Mr. HOWE. In 1871. The Senate has twice since voted to extend the time further. The House of Representatives has declined to acquiesce in the extension. But the State is still going on with the construction of the work. There are those who have said, as the Senator from Ohio just now said, that the general law gives to the executive department the power to declare the forfeiture against the State and to enforce it. The executive department did not act upon that, did not attempt to exercise that power if it possessed the power; but others have assumed that by the expiration of the term and the non-completion of the road the title of the State was gone.

Mr. THURMAN. May I inquire as a matter of fact of the Senator whether these lands thus granted for the construction of that road have been in the language of the bill "restored to market by order of the General Land Office?"

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Then this bill does not touch them.

Mr. HOWE. But suppose the bill passes with these words in, and the Senator puts that question to me six months hence, I am afraid I shall not be able to answer as I answer him to-day.

Mr. THURMAN. The words are, "have been."

Mr. HOWE. "Have been?" Yes, I understand that language, and I understand to-day that it refers to all the time preceding to-day; but it will be a law speaking six months hence if you pass the bill with them in, and then when the question arises six months hence whether they have been restored to market by order of the General Land Office I shall have to answer, not with reference to what the Commissioner of the General Land Office has already done up to-day, but with reference to what he may have done after you have passed this bill, when you put the inquiry to me again.

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator from Wisconsin must know that the Commissioner of the General Land Office cannot of his own motion to-day restore that land to market.

Mr. HOWE. If you pass this bill?

Mr. HARVEY. No, sir. There is a general law on that subject, requiring the action of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior, as well as certain ministerial action of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. HOWE. There is a general law declared by the mouth of the Supreme Court which says that neither the General Land Office, nor the Secretary of the Interior nor the President himself, can declare and enforce that forfeiture against the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HARVEY. Then what is the object of the amendment?

Mr. HOWE. Because you propose to confer that power upon the Land Office in this section, and I ask you not to do it, and I ask you to put just such an amendment, without the slightest prejudice to your bill, as will say you do not mean to confer that power, and I am met by a twofold argument, one saying that he will not have it, and the other saying that he ought to have it. Certainly, if the State is criminally in default, tie her up and strip her and apply the thongs to her. She has been lashed for a good many years for the amusement of a corporation in this city. If she has got to stand further stripes, I suppose she will take them like a dutiful child. I wish you would not do it, however.

Mr. SARGENT. What is the corporation in this city that the Senator refers to?

Mr. HOWE. I have not looked at the act of incorporation; I cannot mention the style of it just now. It would not be worth while to mention it if I did remember. I have said repeatedly that either one or the other amendment, the one suggested by the Senator from California or that suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, will make it clear that you do not mean to give this power to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I will accept either of them; but if you say you will not make that clear in any language, then I must conclude that you mean to enforce the forfeiture.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have some little hesitancy in saying anything about this bill, because I have already confessed my gnorance of it, although I have read it, and therefore I did not need the suggestion of my friend from Wisconsin that I should do so; and yet I was not able to read it until about four o'clock yesterday afternoon, and I have heard none of the discussion on the bill before to-day, having been kept out of the Senate all this week by sickness. Therefore what I shall say now I shall rather say for the purpose of obtaining information than to suggest anything in respect to the merits of the bill, except to suggest that there seems to me to be an equity which it is the object of this bill to protect that I think ought to commend it very highly to our consideration. I had supposed until I read the bill that it was intended for a class of cases in which great hardship exists, and that is where Congress has made land grants to railroads and not taken the precaution in the land-grant bill to protect homestead settlements that were made before the passage of the land-grant bill.

I understand that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the last grant overrode the inchoate homestead settlement right, unless the land-grant bill in express terms excepted homesteads from the operation of the land grant. I am sure there must be something of that kind, for we have had petitions after petitions, and I have one on my desk now from citizens of Iowa, complaining bitterly that their homesteads have been taken away from them under that decision of the Supreme Court. I have always supposed that, even without any express exception of homesteads from the operation of a land grant, bills granting lands and the homestead law ought to be considered in pari materia, and that the land grant ought to be considered as subject to the right of the homestead settler; and if it has been decided otherwise, a case of very great hardship is created.

But I find, on examining this bill, that it does not touch that class of cases at all, that it only deals with cases in which the homestead settler has entered upon the lands after the making of the land grant to the railroad company, or to the State, if I understand the bill correctly.

Mr. MERRIMON. While the land grant is floating?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; but where the entries upon the land were after the land grant and before notice of the location of the railroad and the consequent withdrawal of the alternate sections from the market has been notified to the register and receiver at the local land office.

Mr. ALLISON. That is one clause.

Mr. THURMAN. That is one clause; and then there is another clause, which seems to have been intended to relate to cases in which grants have been made which are supposed to have lapsed by non-compliance with the condition upon which the grants were made. After that lapse of time which made the title of the corporation or of the State a defeasible title, persons have gone upon the land and made homestead settlements, and afterward Congress has revived the land grant and waived the forfeiture. That seems to be the other class of cases, as well as I understand. I suppose those to be cases where the lands are "restored," and I presume in those cases where the grant is supposed to have lapsed the bill requires that the lands shall have been restored to market.

Now, the first thing that troubles me in respect to this bill, recognizing the equity of the persons who in good faith have made homestead settlements in total ignorance that these lands were excluded, or would be excluded, from homestead settlement is whether or not the effect of this bill is to impair the titles that have been created under the legislation of Congress. That is the question upon which I solicited information from my friend from Wisconsin, who is so good a lawyer and so capable of expressing an opinion, and who has studied this bill; but I got no answer from him, nor have I had any answer except privately from any of those advocating the bill. They do not tell me whether the effect of this bill will be to impair any title, either complete or inchoate, that now exists under the legislation of Congress.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly, I do; for I want an answer.

Mr. HARVEY. I can state, as I have done a number of times during the last few days, that the object of this bill is to put the settlers who have complied with the law and the rules and requirements of the Land Department at the time they made their settlements and improvements, in such a position that they will receive from the Land Department that evidence of title which the law and the ruling and practice of the Land Department promised they should have, and which they did have up to the time that a new construction was placed on the law by the Interior Department without any change of the law. In support of that statement I read on the day this bill was taken up a ruling of the Secretary of the Interior reversing a decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Commissioner of the General Land Office having decided that the settlers claiming under the homestead and pre-emption laws were entitled to patents as they had been up to that time. The Secretary of the Interior in his opinion reverses that decision, and states clearly that he does it in pursuance of a new construction, a new ruling adopted since those settlements were begun.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is now speaking wholly of the first section thus far?

Mr. HARVEY. And the second section. I understood the Senator from Ohio in the course of his remarks a little while before I interrupted him to refer to the second section of the bill. Am I correct, or did he refer to the second clause of the first section?

Mr. THURMAN. I referred to the whole of the bill. I want to know if it undertakes to settle by legislation who has title?

Mr. HARVEY. No, sir, it does not undertake to settle by legislation who has title, but it does undertake to settle by legislation that this new construction which the Interior Department saw fit to make at a certain time shall not be conclusive against the settler; that it shall not deprive him of the evidence of title which the law gave him. The bill provides that his original certificate of entry, whether pre-emption or homestead, shall not be canceled and by that means the settler kept out of court, as he is by the practical operation of this ruling, which was made by the Secretary without any change of the law.

Mr. MORTON. How long had the former ruling been established?

Mr. HARVEY. The former ruling had been established from the beginning of the land-grant system, as I understand. I have here a number of papers giving the dates of the different rulings; but, to satisfy the Senator from Ohio, I ask him to refer to the RECORD containing the proceedings of the day before yesterday, where he will see a decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the ruling of the Secretary of the Interior reversing that decision, which ruling is the cause of the bringing of this bill here to remedy the great wrongs inflicted upon citizens who have acted in full compliance with the law and with every requirement of the Department up to the time that change of ruling was made—I think in 1873. I can tell by referring to the date of the decision as published in the RECORD.

In that decision the Secretary admits that it is an entirely new and different ruling and that it amounts almost to an entire change of the operation of the law. Besides that, the decision adopted by him at that time and admitted to be a new ruling makes the right of the railroad, as he says, superior to that of the settlers. Therefore he reverses the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the effect of that decision since that time has been that every entry of that kind, no matter how strictly in conformity with the law and the rulings and practice of the Land Department, and the evidence of title given under it prior to that time, has been canceled.

Mr. THURMAN. I owe an apology to the Senator from Kansas for compelling him to explain what it appears he had already explained to the Senate before when I was not here; but I am seeking information on this subject myself, and I find other Senators who also seem to be in the same situation. Now, if I understand the statement of the Senator from Kansas, the necessity for the first clause of this bill arises from this state of facts: That it had been decided by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the right to make homestead settlements existed up to the time that the officers of the local land office were notified that the lands were held by the railroad company or were assigned to it, and that on the faith of that interpretation of the law by the Land Office the people made homestead settlements on these lands; that afterward, I do not know how long, one or two years perhaps, the Secretary of the Interior overruled that decision of the Land Office.

Mr. KELLY. In 1873.

Mr. THURMAN. How long after the first decision was made?

Mr. HARVEY. The opposite decisions had been made for a number of years.

Mr. OGLESBY. The reverse ruling had been uniform for years.

Mr. KELLY. I have here, in the case of Boyd vs. Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company (Copp's Public Land Laws, page 392) certain decisions made by the Land Department on the 28th of April, 1871. This is the syllabus of the case:

> At the time the line of the railroad was definitely fixed, Hinks had a homestead claim on the land in controversy.
> After that he abandoned his claim, and Boyd made application to enter the tract.
> Held: That the land reverted to the United States upon the abandonment by Hinks, and was subject to entry by Boyd.

That was all that I understand had been the ruling of the Land Office. Under that practice many claims were abandoned; that is, the possessor sold out his possessory interest and the grantee entered upon the land as public land subject to entry, subject to pre-emption, subject to homestead, and it had been always so regarded. The railroad companies interfered. They claimed a different construction of the law. They claimed that when this land was abandoned then the right passed to the railroad company. That was the ruling made afterward on the 7th of July, 1873, by Secretary Delano. As has been stated by the Senator from Kansas, he reversed the previous understanding of the Land Department, and thereby jeopardized the interests of many settlers on the public lands who had gone upon those lands on the faith of the Government of the United States according to the rulings of the Land Department. That decision, reversing the construction given by the Land Department, has rendered many homeless, or at least taken away their lands when, under the former ruling, they were entitled to them. Now, as I understand, the second section of the bill is to restore, really, the condition of the law as it was at the time these railroad bills were passed. As has been said again and again here, these claims were excepted from the grant to the railroads. All pre-emption and homestead claims were excepted from the land grants. The land being excepted, when did these railroad companies get the right to it? That is the question. No subsequent grant was made, but the ruling of the Department is, that where the claim is abandoned it shall go not to the United States or to the subsequent settler, but it shall go to the railroad company. That is the simple statement of the case. I am sorry I interrupted the Senator from Ohio so long.

Mr. MERRIMON. There has been no decision of the courts to that effect, I understand.

Mr. KELLY. Allow me to say that there has been no decision, as I understand it, by any court of justice upon the rights of these respective parties. It is merely an adjudication of the Land Department. I understand further that no patents have issued to these railroad companies at all, but they take by virtue of the grant contained in the act of Congress, and no patent is required.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not complain at all of the interruption, because I am seeking information in order to know how to vote, and therefore I am obliged to any Senator who gives me information; but now, having received some light on this subject, I want to call the attention of my friends to one consideration. To do that I must repeat a little what I have already said. It appears that certain persons, numerous persons I suppose, made homestead settlements on the public lands under rules then existing in the General Land Office which entitled them to make such settlements. They made their entries in good faith under the law as the law was then construed by the General Land Office. I believe I am correct in that statement. It appears that afterward a ruling was made by the Secretary of the Interior which reversed the former ruling of the Department as to the meaning of the law and held that the grants to the railroad companies, or to the States, were paramount to the homestead claims of these settlers; and now it is the object of this bill to remedy that wrong, as it is said.

Mr. KELLY. That wrong construction.

Mr. THURMAN. But what is that construction is the thing that troubles me. By a construction of the law it is said by the Secretary of the Interior that the title to these lands has vested in these companies or in the States, and this bill is an attempt to decide that question by legislation. I am such an old lawyer that I think legal questions are to be decided by the courts; that titles to property are to be determined by adjudication of the judiciary, and not by legislation; and that is what troubles me in this case.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator will pardon me I will state, and I am sure the RECORD will show it, that the ground on which the Secretary of the Interior decided is this: He holds by his decision that the right of the railroad company attaches to the land in some cases by the passage of a resolution by a board of directors of a railroad company, no matter where held, no matter whether the settler has any notification of it or not; in other words, that the right of a railroad company attaches by the prosecution of a survey made by a corps of engineers employed by that company, ignoring the general law on the subject, which provides upon what condition the homestead or pre-emption settler may have title to land, setting that entirely aside by the action of these corporations. It goes for nothing, according to his decision, that Congress has passed a law well guarded, a most beneficent law, enabling the people who see fit to go upon the public lands of the United States to make homes there in compliance with the law and the requirements of Congress. I say it goes for nothing that such is the fact, if the directors of a railroad company, sitting in some distant city thousands of miles away, have decided by a vote that they will occupy a certain line of road and as a consequence take a certain quantity of land for a certain distance on each side of the line. According to that decision it is not necessary that the Government officials be notified of such action; it is not necessary that the receiver and register of the land office have any notification of it. The settler goes, in pursuance of the law of the land assigning him where he shall make his pre-emption or homestead claim, and makes his claim there, spends all his money, spends the time of years and his most industrious efforts to make a good home in the hope that he will there have a resting-place for life. Some years after this system has been in force, when he has acted upon it in pursuance of law and justice, according to the construction which has been made of the law for years, suddenly a new light dawns on the Secretary of the Interior and he decides that the action of these servants of a corporation shall render null and void the general laws of the United States and the action of the officials who have been properly appointed in every land district in the United States. That is where the whole question turns. There is nothing else involved in this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I assure my friend, the Senator from Kansas, that there is nobody on this floor who has more sympathy for homestead settlers than I have; there is nobody on this floor who with more persistency has opposed every single railroad land grant. I never voted for one in my life. Even where I wanted to vote for one really, so as to equalize things a little, I could not do it. I never have voted for one, and therefore my sympathies are with the object of this bill; but yet we must not lose sight of what is a fundamental principle, that people's titles are not to be legislated away from them. We do not decide titles by legislation. The question is as to the interpretation of the law; and on that let every man have his day in court and let the courts decide.

Now, I have a suggestion to make, and if the friends of the bill will adopt it I think it will remedy all this trouble; it is such a provision as Congress has adopted in respect to private land claims again and again and again. I might cite hundreds of cases; in fact, it has been the usual insertion in bills that are reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims. And that is to insert that the grant of the patent by the United States shall be subject to any adverse rights to the lands. That is the common and usual provision in bills reported from the Private Land Claims Committee, and has been for half a century. Away back to the acts confirming Florida land grants they were again and again made subject to the rights of adverse claimants. If that were done in this case——

Mr. HARVEY. Is not that the rule of law without any such exception?

Mr. THURMAN. It may be a rule of law, and yet it would be very wise, it seems to me, to insert it in this bill, so that you shall not undertake to deprive people of any adverse rights which they have. If that were done, I think no objection whatsoever could be made to that part of the bill.

While I am up, as I do not want to trouble the Senate with anything further on the subject, I will read an amendment that I shall propose as an additional section to the bill, unless it shall be shown to be unnecessary; and that is this:

Nothing in this act contained shall have the effect to make the United States liable for a failure of title created under or by this act, or a failure of any land grant affected by this act.

I am a little apprehensive that, if this bill were to pass just in the shape it is, we might have two classes of claimants here, who would say we ought to make good to them damages for loss of title. If the grant were made under this bill to the homestead settler, and the patent issued to him, and his title afterward was proved to be defective, that is to say, if the title of the railroad company should be held better than his because the railroad land grant operated proprio vigore to vest the title in the railroad company on the location of the line without any patent, and that therefore the homestead settler's patent was of no value whatsoever and conveyed no title to him, he might have a claim for reclamation upon us. I do not say he would at law; but he might have what might be supposed to be an equitable claim which we had recognized. On the other hand, if it should be said this has the effect to oust the railroad companies of title, or, mark it, persons purchasing from the railroad companies, and who have paid their money to the railroad companies, and who are just as honest settlers on the land as anybody else, and we have ousted them of their title by our legislation, perhaps they would have some claim upon us.

Mr. HAMLIN. Why should they not?

Mr. THURMAN. I am rather inclined to stop all claims just now in the present state of the Treasury.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose the map of the railroad company is filed and notice is first given, of course the railroad company would have no authority to sell the land before they had selected it; they could not make any sales before they themselves had filed their map and determined what pieces of land they were going to take; but if at that time there is an actual settler upon the land in adverse possession, would there not be at least notice to any person who might purchase of the railroad company?

Mr. THURMAN. It might be so unless the first homestead settler had abandoned the land; but the second section provides for cases where he has abandoned it and some other person comes in. There may have been nobody in possession when the man purchased of the railroad company, but some one else comes in after the first settler has abandoned.

But I do not want to be finding fault with this bill. I am disposed to vote for it, although I must say it does seem to me that we ought to have had a full report of the facts from the committee—I say it with great respect to the committee—to show us exactly the necessities for this legislation; and I do think we ought to have a safeguard as to the rights of adverse claimants.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio as offering that as an amendment?

Mr. THURMAN. I would prefer that some one who has the bill in charge would do it. I do not wish to intermeddle much with it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the friends of the bill accept that suggestion?

Mr. HARVEY. In answer to that question I will simply repeat what I said yesterday:

As the purpose of this bill is simply the vindication of rights of certain settlers who have suffered by a misconstruction of the law, I do not think it ought to be complicated with other legislation. I hope the Senate will pass the bill without loading it with amendments on other questions but remotely, if at all, connected with the pending bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand, then, that the friends of the bill do not accept the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio. Now, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, because it protects the vested rights or the rights, inchoate though they may be, of Wisconsin; but I am not content to vote for this bill merely because the rights of Wisconsin are protected, and leave the rights of all the other States and people of the United States unprotected. This bill I will vote for with great pleasure if it may be amended so as to provide that nothing contained in it shall impair vested rights of property or affect existing litigation. I believe, or at least I fear, that this bill does both of these things.

One objection that has been made to the amendment that it shall not affect existing rights of property is, that it is unnecessary. I do not think that it is unnecessary. Another answer that is made is that we have not the power to divest vested rights. Well, that answer may be made when a proposition is up here, that we shall pay the bonds of the United States in gold, as a ground for passing a law that they shall be paid in currency, because we have not the power to violate the faith of the United States. If this bill passes, it is a sovereign speaking to its ministerial officers as to what they shall do with muniments of title.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator deny our authority to do that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I deny our right to interfere with vested rights of property.

Mr. INGALLS. That is no answer to the question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And I think that that would interfere with vested rights of property; and therefore I deny the right, not the power, of Congress to do it. We have no better right, in my opinion, to pass a law that interferes with the vested rights of property than the courts have to pronounce a judgment that interferes with vested rights of property; and it is no answer to say that the courts will overrule us if it does interfere with vested rights. We have no right to do it.

But, Mr. President, further it does seem to me that this bill directly affects existing litigation. I made a statement on that point yesterday in hopes that there would be some answer made to it, but I have heard none. I happened in the month of October to be in the Supreme Court and my attention was called to a case there pending in which I had no interest in any way. The case was in reference to lands in Kansas. In 1825 a treaty was made with the Osage Indians by which the United States reserved 950,000 acres of land for the benefit of those Indians so long as they should choose to occupy it. In 1866 those Indians, the cestui que trusts, released to the trustee, the United States, this land in trust that it should be sold according to the land laws of the country and the proceeds invested for the benefit of the Indians. Under that law of 1866 extensive sales have been made to settlers.

So far it is all very well; but it happens that in 1863, three years before this last act, the United States made a grant to the State of Kansas of a large tract of land, including these lands, and Kansas has granted these lands to two railroad companies—the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston, and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas. Those companies claim that their grant precedes that of 1866. The grant, however, that was made to Kansas in 1863 contains this exception, "excepting out of the lands here described all reservations of the United States." The United States claim that that exception excepted from the operation of that grant this Indian reservation; and they directed—I believe it was done by act of Congress—but at all events the United States brought suits against those two railroad companies to have the patents of the companies canceled so that the rights of these settlers might be confirmed. The circuit court of the United States decided in favor of the United States and against the railroad companies. The railroad companies urged this plea: "The reservation of the United States had been extinguished in 1863; our rights have frequently been recognized; we have equities equal to those equities of the settlers, for bondholders have advanced their money on bonds secured by mortgage on these lands;" and an appeal from that decision of the circuit court has been argued in the Supreme Court, and is now awaiting decision.

Then, in reference to a large class of settlers in Kansas at this day who have bought their land, complied with the provisions of the land laws, just as this bill says, we have a case pending in the Supreme Court, and this legislative body steps in and confirms the title of those settlers. It steps in and takes the place of the Supreme Court and makes the decision. It may be that the decision of the court below will be affirmed; but I think that it is not the province of a legislative body to interpose and assume powers of adjudication and to pronounce judgment.

For these two reasons—because I believe this act does affect vested rights and because it does interfere with existing litigation—I will vote for this bill if there is a proviso providing that it shall not affect vested rights or existing litigation, and I cannot without.

Mr. HARVEY. I only want to correct a misapprehension of the Senator from New Jersey, by stating that as I understand it the case that he refers to in the Supreme Court turns upon different questions entirely, to which this bill has no relation, as I understand. The bill substantially in the form it is now before the Senate passed the House of Representatives I think before that appeal was taken from the decision of the United States circuit court in the Osage ceded-land case. At any rate, I think the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension when he supposes that the passage of this bill would in any way affect the questions upon which the case in the Supreme Court is to be determined.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, although chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and to some extent familiar with the provisions of this bill, I have not heretofore said anything upon the subject. I have abstained from any discussion of it for two reasons: first, because on account of the anxiety of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARVEY] on the subject and his familiarity with it, exceeding mine very largely, the committee intrusted the control and management of the bill on this floor to him; and next, because of my want of familiarity with the subject in its legal bearings which I had not studied, and as is the lot of many Senators here have not had time to study carefully. To talk about law when one does not thoroughly understand it, and to endeavor to impart a knowledge of law to other members as dark as one's own, is a dull, heavy business, and throws more fog than light upon a subject. There are, however, a few thoughts in connection with this bill that I may dwell upon for a short time, and then I shall be glad, as I have no doubt this body will be glad, to have the matter disposed of, either by defeating the bill or by passing it into a statute law of the nation, as I hope will be done.

There are some general considerations connected with this subject which it may be well not to overlook, and I do not know but that refreshing our minds about those general considerations may have some bearing on the question of vested rights.

Mr. President, the original theory of a grant of land by the General Government to aid in the construction of railroads was not exclusively to open new lines of commerce, not exclusively to facilitate the modes of transportation; but, as Senators will remember, the original theory applied in my own State by the experimental legislation on the subject was that it would encourage a development of the State by bringing actual settlers to occupy theretofore unoccupied public lands. It was an invitation and an encouragement to the people of the older States to migrate to the West to occupy the valuable public lands there lying vacant. That was the theory of the Illinois Central Railroad grant. It has been the theory connected with every railroad grant passed by Congress since. Under that incentive or motive all the railroad bills that have ever passed Congress have been carried into execution, on the idea that the intention was to populate the States and to occupy this vacant land. When the donations were made, the Government reserved all the even-numbered sections of land. That is plain. The Government reserved also the odd sections of land (which it will be remembered were those always given to the railroads) wherever they had been previously disposed of by occupation, by purchase, by public sale, or by any special reservation. All such odd sections were all specially reserved from the operation of the railroad grant, still keeping in mind the general purpose of legislating, not for the benefit of the railroads, but for the benefit of the States and for the purpose or securing the occupation of the public lands. These were the inducements universally held out.

Now, the land-grant acts say that after the railroad companies shall have established their line, shall have accepted the grant, shall have made the maps of their line, and shall have constructed and put in operation so many miles of railroad, then the land granted shall be vested in them. What land? The even-numbered sections? No; for they were never granted. All the odd-numbered sections within five or six miles? Certainly not; for many of them had been reserved under various exceptions. They were not even then to go to the railroad company. What next? When the time should come for definitely fixing the line of location of the road, then the railroad company had progressed so far in establishing its inchoate rights as to have a vested right to the odd-numbered sections within the boundaries prescribed not excepted or reserved from the grant. Now, look at the equity, look at the purpose of these laws, come down to the sense of the thing, and when was that right to formally vest in the railroad to the odd sections? When was that time that was to divest the right of the public to take the odd sections as well as the even? When the preliminary line was run? When the line was permanently fixed, platted, mapped, and returned to the Secretary of the Interior? Was that the equitable or the legal time when the public were to be divested and the corporation were to be invested with the right to this land? No, sir. Look to the action of the Government, look to the operation of the public land laws for fifty years before that time; and what was it? All public land put in market or subject to entry by pre-emption or homestead settlement was dealt out to the people through the local land offices. They were the lungs of the public land system. There was where the people of the great West could touch and feel the General Government. They had no access to the Department of the Interior, no familiarity with the decisions of courts, and were strangers to the legislation of Congress in exceptional cases upon the public land; but every man and every woman and everybody knew where the land office was, where the register and receiver lived; all knew that the public records were kept there, and that there was the place for the western pioneer and adventurer to go and get the muniments of title to his home. Consistently with that general expectation and consistently with that uniform theory, the Secretary of the Interior ruled over and over again that, notwithstanding the line was laid by the company, notwithstanding the plats and charts were made and filed here, as the public knew nothing of these operations, their rights always continued until the lands within the limits of the grant were withdrawn from sale, from entry, or from occupation at the local land offices.

Now, does not this body see, as I apprehend this country will see, that if there be vested rights here, vested privileges, vested immunities, anything vested, based upon law or upon custom, those vested rights are with the uneducated and inexperienced man of the West, who knew the Government through its local land offices, and knew the Government in no other way? When the Government should withdraw the land from the public with the view of vesting it in a railroad company, the proper and only judicious and equitable place was at the local land office, away out in the Territories or in the Western States, far away from lines of communication with the East or with the General Government.

Do you not perceive then, Mr. President, that, when a custom that had been standing for fifty years and was perfectly well understood by the people was violated by a new, a recent, a modern interpretation of the law, that interpretation made in July, 1873, the operation would be harsh and severe? What was to keep the people from going on and making entries, not alone of the even-numbered sections, but making entries and homestead settlements upon the odd-numbered sections within the limits of the railroad grant, until they could know at the local land office what land the grant included by proclamation of the President or by the order of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, filed at the local land office or published there? How could they otherwise know it so well as by that process?

I am talking of the equities of this whole question. I admit that whatever the Supreme Court may have decided for the time being is law, and ought to be law, and will remain law. I say that for the benefit of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] who have been discussing this bill, as I think, in a very fair spirit. I have not been under the impression that they are trying to defeat it by technicalities at all; but they are accustomed to look at all these questions through the light of judicial channels, and they hang, and very persistently hang, upon a judicial determination, for there is where they go for the settlement of all questions of law of every description, and they are naturally disposed to apply that rule when dealing with these settlers upon the western frontier. They go to the courts for interpretation.

This bill is for the settler, the pre-emptor; and I am not overly in love with that character, Mr. President. I do not think he is the beau ideal of human perfection. But still, the honest pre-emptor has the same rights that the honest homestead settler has. One goes upon the land, and by five years' actual and continuous occupation and improvement of the land acquires a title. The other does so by actual improvement and occupation for one year. The pre-emptor pays the price of the Government at the end of one year after actual improvement and occupation; the homestead settler remains five years and takes the title without the payment of a dollar. That is the only difference between them; but I suppose their rights are the same if they have complied with the law. Now, one of the reasons why this bill is brought here, if I understand the Senators from Kansas and Nebraska and from the Pacific coast who have taken a deep interest in this matter, is this: Actual settlers took this land prior to the time when it was withdrawn from the local land office but after the day that the railroad company had permanently fixed the line of its road; and that is what Senators seem to be at fault about. They do not seem to clearly comprehend what there is in this step or span or length of time, the time between the fixing of a line in the office of the board of directors, and the other time, away after that, when the land was withdrawn from sale or entry at the local land office in the West. Between these two times the trouble here arises. Originally, down to 1873, the time when the railroad's right accrued was when the land was withdrawn at the local land office in Iowa, Illinois, or the Western States or Territories. Since 1873 the time is the day of filing the permanent and final line of location of the railroad in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, instead of at the local land office in the West.

These men habitually accustomed to making locations with reference to the withdrawal of public land, at the local land office kept on making locations as they had made them before. The Secretary of the Interior stops them all at once and after thousands of locations had been made, stops them by what the members more directly and more immediately interested in the question than I am regard as an arbitrary decision. Now, what are the rights of these settlers? Says the Senator from Ohio, "Why, this is a judicial question. If these men have rights, the courts will determine them; if these railroads have legal rights, the courts will not and cannot take them away." But he overlooks one feature in the case. The Secretary of the Interior, after the line is established and filed in his Department, having abolished the old system and the old plan, takes the map of the grant, covering land five or ten or fifteen miles wide on each side of the line of the road, and at that instant of time takes his pencil or his pen and marks certain odd sections as belonging to the railroad company, and all these odd sections from that instant of time belong to the railroad, forgetting the old custom. Knowing nothing about this new interpretation, these western people have gone on disregarding the little pencil marks made by the Secretary of the Interior on the map in his Office, and have gone to the open maps in the local land office and found that the odd sections were not marked there as taken, but they were marked there as vacant still. They went upon them, filed their preliminary papers, paid the preliminary fees, took possession, went upon the land, and fondly thought they had a home.

Gentlemen argue here that this is a legal matter, to be determined by the courts of justice and not by the legislation of Congress. They say let the parties go into court and maintain their rights. What does the Secretary of the Interior do when he takes the pencil and marks the odd sections all along for a hundred or a thousand miles to a railway company? What other little thing does he do? When the quarterly returns come in from the local land offices with these odd-numbered sections which he has marked to the railroad marked as occupied by private citizens or persons who have filed a declaration of intention to become citizens and who have received a certificate of location to identify their rights, the Secretary of the Interior takes another pencil and obliterates all these locations, vacates these certificates of location, at one fell swoop drives them all away, divests each settler of his right or of any muniment of title. His location is vacated, declared vacated on the books of the Department here, and the title declared vested in the railroad company; and a patent is granted to the railroad company for lands which had been occupied for weeks or months, which the local land-office books show the settler owns or has an inchoate or preliminary right to. All such rights are cut out, planed off, shoved aside, and the man is left with his prairie or his timber alone, without a muniment of title or a paper to stand upon in any court of law. In the district court of the United States, or in the circuit court, or in one of the local courts of the State, if he shall bring an ejectment to recover possession from a man who has purchased from the railroad company, he is confronted with the patent of the United States to the lands in the railroad company and a deed from the railroad company to its assignee or vendee. There he stands, helpless. What title has he got to show? He is stripped, cleaned of everything.

It strikes me that if there are any vested rights here the vested rights are with the man who has made an occupation of the country according to the customs and the usages of the nation. "Vested rights" are with the man who, in obedience to this policy, carrying practically the policy of the Government into effect, moved upon the land and occupied the land as we in all our grand speeches insisted he would and should do. In order to pacify the public mind and to reconcile the people to these railroad grants, we made these repeated declarations of the policy and purpose that it was to encourage the settlement of the western States and western Territories. These pioneers have accepted the invitation of this liberal policy, and gone there and made settlements according to the old custom which held this land open on the books of the local register. A man who has done this finds himself up-tripped by a new decision of the Secretary of the Interior, and when he comes into a court of law he finds himself again up-tripped, for he has no muniment of title, no paper to show his right, while the patent is outstanding in the hands of the railroad or of the assignee or the purchaser from the railroad.

Sir, I do not see why there should be so much trouble about understanding this bill. If there is anybody on this floor who has trouble of that kind I think it is myself. I do not know of any member here more usually befogged than I am, and even I can understand this bill. Why, see how plain it is, Mr. President.

That all pre-emption and homestead entries, or entries in compliance with any law of the United States, of the public lands, made in good faith by actual settlers upon tracts of land of not more than one hundred and sixty acres each, within the limits of any land grant, prior to the time—

prior to the time when notice of the withdrawal of the lands embraced in such grant was received at the local land office of the district in which such lands are situated, or after their restoration to market by order of the General Land Office, and where the pre-emption and homestead laws have been complied with, and proper proofs thereof have been made by the parties holding such tracts or parcels, they shall be confirmed.

That is what this act of Congress will say when it is finished, when it is passed into a law. It will read:

They shall be confirmed, and patents for the same shall issue to the parties entitled thereto.

That at least is plain. Well, but say Senators—the Senator from Ohio says—"Let us put an amendment right on there, providing in substance" (I cannot repeat the language of it) "that the United States shall in no event be liable for compensation for damages to any party in consequence of the issuance of this new patent; that, if damages result from the issuing of a prior patent, the Government shall not be liable in damages; and if damages result from issuing this last patent the Government shall not be liable." Does the Senator from Ohio expect, by putting such an amendment on this bill, if we pass it, to exonerate the Government from damages, if it shall be legally liable to them by issuing two patents or three patents to the same tract of land? That is manifestly a judicial question, and ought not to be on this bill. That ought to be reserved for the courts. We ought not to encumber this act with a purely judicial question, as to whether the Government is liable or not. And can the Government shirk responsibility from just damages by putting a proviso to a law? I think not.

It shall not be a reason in my mind why this bill shall not pass because the condition that the amendment proposes to interpose conflicts with the merits of this bill and the rights of the people whom this bill is about to be passed to benefit. Therefore I will not vote for an amendment the effect of which may be to divest those people of any rights they may have, because they have pursued the known and open laws of the land in making their entries upon public lands. That is the reason I will oppose any such amendment. It is not because I do not want to preserve the Government of the United States and the Treasury from damages. It is not because I am not willing to protect at all times the revenues of the country against assault from any direction. But while I am legislating here in what appears to my mind to be a clear and smooth channel, to put on their feet again those people who have been uptripped by a decision of the Secretary of the Interior, I will not embargo their rights by putting on other conditions here which are to hold them in abeyance for years.

As it is now, these people cannot be heard in court. If I understand the law of this case, as debated here by better lawyers than I am, they cannot be heard in an action of ejectment; they cannot stand upon their possessory right against a paper title, under seal from the Government of the United States, in the hands of an adverse holder. I propose under this bill to give them a patent. I propose that they shall receive a patent from the Government if they have honestly and faithfully pursued the pre-emption and homestead laws under the regulations of the Interior Department.

As I said some time ago, to my mind the vested rights in the case belong exclusively and wholly to the settler. Where has the railroad company got any vested right? It is assumed in this debate that it has a vested right. Has it a vested right because it has improperly obtained a patent to land it had no right to? Has it a vested right because it has laid down a line of railway away off from the country where the road is to run? Has it a vested right because the Secretary of the Interior, in a decision which he thought fit to make, has put them above the settler by a decision of his? Has that given them an absolute right? I say the settler has the vested right, and this bill comes in to recognize that vested right and put him, whether he be few or many, where he stood before this ruling was made. Then he will have his patent issued by the General Government, he will have possession of the land, and it is no answer to me, appalling as the consequence may appear to some Senators on this floor, that the railroad company or its assignee may also come in and present a patent for the same land. Here is the deliberative legislative body of this nation appealed to for the purpose of passing laws. We look to the equities of the case as well as the courts of justice. It is the particular province of this body to look at the equities of the case, to look at the rights of the people. How are these settlers to meet these corporations in these great land suits? Why, Mr. President, it is impossible for these people to combine. Can fifty or one hundred settlers get together whose rights are in dispute under this interpretation of the Secretary of the Interior and by contribution raise the funds to go through the long line of litigations, including costs and attorneys' fees? These people cannot combine; they have no means of making combinations; they have no capital to build upon; whereas, whether the railroad company be rich or poor, whether it be popular or unpopular, whether its railroad track be wisely or unwisely located, whatever of capital and power it has is compact and organized and under the touch of the bell-string. They can be heard; they are organized and in force. These other men, scattered and wandering over the western plains, cannot combine to test their rights. Equity, fair-dealing, justice, (not to be interfered with by the intervention of technicalities at this late hour,) demand that this law shall be passed, that these people may be put where they stood for fifty years, where in equity and good conscience they should stand now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I have listened pretty attentively to this debate with a view to ascertain, if I could, what I ought to do upon the final passage of this bill. If I could have any sympathies in the case, they would be on what might be called the popular side of the question; that is to say, in favor of that large class of persons whose individual rights are involved in this question. But, Mr. President, I look at it as a question, so far as this bill presents a question, of conflict of interest between two or more parties, each of them claiming under the Government of the United States. The bill in its effect must be that, I think. It is designed to settle questions between two or more adverse interests.

The Senator who has just resumed his seat, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, says that there can be no such thing as a vested right in a railroad company, as I understand him. Well, Mr. President, I do not raise that question; it does not become me to discuss it; but that is the identical question here. It is said that an invidious interpretation has been given by the Land Office or by the Secretary of the Interior of the land laws in favor of some railroad grant. I do not agree to that at all. Unquestionably this bill is designed to settle a conflict of interest, and that conflict of interest arises on the legislation of Congress in both instances. First, the Congress of the United States has been accustomed to make land grants to the States, and sometimes to railroad corporations, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads. It is intended that the railroad companies or the States should have rights in those lands. The question arises, when do those rights become perfected in the companies or in the States so that they have what may be termed a vested interest. Now, here is an authority which I understood the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to read from the other day, yesterday perhaps or the day before, which seems to intimate that there is a time when it may be said that the grantee under such a grant has got a perfected title. When is that? Referring to certain acts which I have not before me and do not know what their effect was, it says:

The act of June 3, 1856, and the first section of the act of May 5, 1864, are grants in præsenti, and passed the title to the odd sections designated to be afterward located; when the route was fixed their location became certain, and the title, which was previously imperfect, acquired precision and became attached to the land.

It may be said that those particular grants are peculiar and have a force which ordinary grants do not possess. I do not know how that is; but I take it for granted that when Congress makes a grant of land to a State it is by terms and under circumstances where it is practicable for the State to take an interest in it and acquire a property in it; and I should say, according to the decision here, that that would accrue whenever the grantee had accepted the terms and conditions of the act, had defined the limits and ascertained precisely where it proposed to locate the lands. That seems to be the principle recognized in this decision. If that is so, there is a fixed and determinate time under these land grants when the State or the grantee under the grant for beneficial purposes may be said to have a right. That is as clear as anything can be.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator regard the title to the land as absolute?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I regard it as absolute as the property could be conveyed by a grant from the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. Although the grantee should fail to comply with the conditions of the grant?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Of course, if it is dependent on conditions there may be a forfeiture.

Mr. INGALLS. Those grants are all so forfeited, and the titles cannot be perfected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The title so far is perfected. They may forfeit. If there are conditions upon which the further holding depends they may forfeit, of course.

The question in my mind is precisely this: Does not this bill undertake to say that independent of any such right as that it is competent for Congress to legislate absolutely in advance of that time? That is the way it impresses me. If it is not so I should with pleasure vote for this bill, but it strikes me that the facts presented here absolutely make this a judicial question, and that we undertake to pass upon the rights of parties without having such facts before us as enable us to tell what the effect of it will be.

Therefore, Mr. President, unless there is some such amendment as has been suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] I do not see how I can vote for this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.]

Mr. HOWE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert at the end of the first section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the title which the State of Wisconsin, or its assigns, may have to lands granted to that State by the act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856, and the acts amendatory thereof, but such title shall remain as valid as the same now is.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOUTWELL, (when his name was called.) On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST.] He would vote against the amendment and I would vote for it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] If he were here I would vote for the amendment and the Senator from Indiana would vote against it.

Mr. DENNIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If he were here he would vote yea and I should vote nay.

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll; and the result was announced—yeas 8, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, and Saulsbury—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Davis, Dorsey, English, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, Windom, Withers, and Wright—41.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Gordon, Hamlin, Morton, Randolph, Robertson, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, and Whyte—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. The Senate have voted against the amendment that I submitted. I want to try the disposition of the Senate on an amendment that I did not devise myself, but one that was suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to meet the very purpose which I said I had in view; and I ask the vote of the Senate upon that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the first section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall not hereafter restore such lands to market without authority of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senate will indulge me, I want to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, and Windom—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, English, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, Thurman, Withers, and Wright—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Cooper, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Gordon, Morton, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Spencer, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, and Whyte—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I am getting nearer to success evidently. [Laughter.] The first prescription I offered to the Senate I could hardly expect to have been taken kindly, because it was compounded by one already classed as an enemy of the bill. The last one was compounded by a friend of the bill, and I see it is received with more favor than the first one was. Though that does not exactly effect a cure, I have another pill prepared by another friend of the bill, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who is not now in his seat; and this, I think, will effect a cure. He said it would. I move the following amendment as a proviso to the first section:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to confer upon the General Land Office any authority to restore to market any land once granted to a State for railroad purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Indiana by leaving the Chamber has evidently abandoned this amendment, and, as it is entirely superfluous, I trust that the friends of the bill will vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. As the Senator from Indiana, as we are informed by the Senator from Kansas, abandoned his own prescription, I feel at liberty to abandon it myself. [Laughter.] I doubt if it would be best to take it. I now propose an amendment prepared by another doctor, equally skillful and quite as friendly to the bill, I suppose, as any one, my honorable friend from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.] I move to amend the bill in the tenth and eleventh lines of the first section by striking out the words "by order of the General Land Office" and inserting the words "in pursuance of law."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In making that suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin, I did it upon information which I supposed was in accordance with the interests of the bill. Subsequently, being advised by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] that it would operate injuriously to the bill, I abandoned it entirely.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand the Senator from Minnesota to go back on his prescription also? [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLAN. I merely took the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, and did not offer it as an amendment at all.

Mr. HOWE. O, no, I knew the Senator did not advertise it; but I felt authorized to advertise it for him.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I believe it is so advertised.

Mr. HOWE. But the Senator does not propose to stand by it?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I will vote against the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to amend the bill by inserting at the end of it these words:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall affect any rights that are now vested.

Mr. ALCORN. One word. I ask whether by voting for that amendment it is to be implied that this Congress can divest rights? If rights have vested can we divest them by this legislation?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The implication would be that this Congress would not divest vested rights if we pass the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOUTWELL, (when his name was called.) I may say, once for all, that I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST.] If present, he would vote as a friend of the bill, and I am opposed to the bill.

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll; and the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 36; as follows;

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Thurman, and Wallace—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Dorsey, English, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Oglesby, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Gordon, Kernan, Key, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Randolph, Wadleigh, and West—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to move an amendment to the third section by striking out the following words, commencing in line 5, "or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant;" so that, if amended, the section will read:

That all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant, shall be deemed valid and a compliance with the laws, and the making of the proof required shall entitle the holder of such claim to a patent therefor.

Mr. INGALLS. So far as I am concerned, as one of the friends of the bill, I am willing that the clause referred to should be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY. I wish to offer an amendment. It is simply a verbal one, but I am satisfied it should be made. In the seventh line of the second section I move to strike out the word "or" where it occurs twice and insert the word "and." It is evidently a mistake.

Mr. BOGY and others. It is a mistake.

Mr. KELLY. It should read:

Who have complied with the laws governing pre-emption or homestead entries, and shall make the proper proofs required under such laws.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe it is agreed that the word should be "and."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this correction? The Chair hears no objection, and it will be made.

Mr. MERRIMON. I said yesterday that I was sincerely desirous of giving my support to this bill if I could do so consistently with my notions of right. I doubt now whether, if it shall become a law, it will effectuate the purpose its friends desire. In that doubt I am inclined to give my vote in favor of the bill, but in doing so I want to exclude any presumption or implication of liability on the part of the Government to anybody to be affected by the bill if it shall pass. Therefore I move to add at the end of the last section the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to imply any obligation upon the United States to compensate any person on account of any claim or right embraced or affected by it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will not also include corporations as well as persons?

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe, under the general law, "persons" embraces "corporations."

Mr. HARVEY. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It is open to the objection that it would complicate the whole measure.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 16, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Dawes, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Robertson, and Thurman—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—33

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Gordon, Maxey, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Wadleigh, Wallace, and West—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have one more amendment to offer. I move to strike out in lines 4 and 5 of section 3 the words "at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant;" so that, if amended, the section will read:

That all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant, shall be deemed valid, and a compliance with the laws and the making of the proof required shall entitle the holder of such claim to a patent therefor.

Mr. SARGENT. That would take the sense out of the section entirely. If it left any meaning in it at all, it would be doing an act which, of course, Congress would have no power to do. The provision of the section is that, if subsequent to the expiration of a grant, and consequently when, in the theory of the friends of the bill, there was no right in the railroad company, these entries were made, they should be held valid; but to strike out the words "subsequent to expiration of such grant" would make them valid, if it were possible to do so, before it expired and while the railroad company had a right. Therefore of course the amendment ought not to be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have spent two pretty laborious days here in endeavoring to ascertain whether I was a friend of this bill or not. Of course I have an ambition to get into a crowd as prosperous, not to say as earnest, as the friends of this bill have shown themselves to be; and I have tried my best to ascertain what was the real purpose and drift of the bill. I do not know that to this moment I understand that. I think I understand what the purpose is not. For two days we have listened to some of the best declamations I have ever heard in the Senate urged here in support of that class of unfortunates who, seeking homes, have been beguiled by the directions or misdirections of the land offices of the United States into making settlements upon specific portions of the public domain which were subsequently held to be covered by grants from Congress to other parties, especially to railroad corporations. I listened to the remarks of my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] this morning till my heart would have bled for that class of men but for one little consideration, and that is that I happen to know this bill will not bring relief to one of them, and will not bring relief within fifty miles of one of them. Lawyers on the floor have pretended to doubt whether it was competent for Congress to convey to this class of men the relief which they seem to be promised by this bill. I make no such question now. There is, however, upon your statute-book a law, as broad as any you can pass, which declares that all lands belonging to the United States are subject to pre-emption, with certain unimportant exceptions not necessary to enumerate, and, just as specifically as an act of Congress can provide, that right of pre-emption is pointed out and defined. There it is. [Holding up a volume of the statutes.] If you can vest a right by an act of Congress, you have invested the right in all the persons described here to pre-empt lands which belong to the United States; and I do understand that that right is just as much within the protection of the judicial power of the country as any right that any man ever asserted anywhere. So that if there be a man in the United States prepared to say and to prove that he has made a pre-emption of lands belonging to the United States, he will be protected in that right without any effort of ours. If any such man, however, has gone on to a tract with a view of making a pre-emption, when in fact and in law the tract had ceased to belong to the United States, but had been granted by the sovereign act of Congress to somebody else, mark it the United States and mark it the pre-emptor, I do not know that you can take it back and give it to the pre-emptor. That is a question of law. Good lawyers, and the best, I am told, in the Senate have declared for this bill. I suppose they are prepared to show that you can take it back and can give it to a pre-emptor. If you can I would do it; but you cannot do it by this bill, for the simple reason that those pre-emptors are not there on the land, have not been there. There may be individual exceptions; but the last of your grants was made a great many years ago; and I take it but very few pre-emptors, or alleged pre-emptors, have been hanging on year after year, year after year, with a view of getting an act of Congress which will convey to them titles.

Therefore I think we are not going to convey any comfort or any relief to pre-emptors or to anybody else, unless to their lawyers. If I was a lawyer, and lived out there on the frontier, or anywhere within the limits of the region of any of these grants, I am inclined to think I might see, if not "millions," at least a good many luscious thousands in a law of this kind. Do not understand me, therefore, as standing here to defend the right of a railroad, the right of a corporation. Of course I know my business better than that. If the real purpose is to execute a railroad, do you not suppose I would have as much fondness for the hanging as any of you? But when the purpose merely is to hang the effigy of a railroad for the purpose of deluding somebody else, I have no particular appetite for that.

I say, then, that I am not going to vote against this bill because it purports to divest rights from a railroad company, nor because it is going to vest any rights, in pre-emptors or homestead settlers. I do not think it does one thing or the other. My own conclusion is—I may be mistaken about it—that the milk of this bill is in the second section and in the third section, and in the two lines of the first section which I have been trying to get an exposition of very ineffectually. The second section of the bill begins to talk business. The first says that if men have gone on to lands within the limits of a railroad grant, though after the time when by law the grant has become operative, in the eye of the law as adjudged to-day that is a valid pre-emption. Well, of course if the man has remained there on that valid pre-emption to this time and can make proof of that fact, he can get his patent for his land; but if he has not remained there, but has abandoned it, what becomes of the land? If, as I assume to be the case, the men who made these mistaken settlements have ceased to stand upon them, have left them, have abandoned them in the language of the second section, what then becomes of the land? Then comes in the second section, which says to the world of land purchasers, homestead settlers, and pre-emptors, and others, "If you can find a tract of land on which there was a pre-emptor or a homestead settler prior to the withdrawal of the lands from market by executive order, and that pre-emptor or homestead settler has abandoned it, you come to the land office and you can pre-empt that land."

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator allow me to just say one word?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. Not to disturb at all the course of his argument, but to state a matter of fact. I am quite unwilling he should entertain the opinion that there are no settlers who would be benefited by the first clause of this bill. He suggests that in view of the lapse of time it is not probable that there are settlers on these lands who have been waiting for this legislation. He must remember in the first place that this legislation has been pending in Congress for three or four years, and I know of my own knowledge that there are a number of settlers in my State who are upon lands that they settled upon prior to the withdrawal of those lands from market, have made improvements upon them, and are there yet; that they have been contesting day after day the claim of the railroads to those lands, and have been relying on the hope that Congress would give them some legislation of this sort. I only mention that because it is a matter of fact in connection with persons in my own State.

Mr. HOWE. I am glad that the statement of the Senator from Iowa has found a place on the record. The bill they have here is entitled to that evidence. I supposed there might be individual cases of settlers on their lands; but the class of those men, I take it, are no longer there. The first section declares that pre-emption a valid one, and the second section, in case they have abandoned it, gives to the rest of the world the right to come in and make a new pre-emption and new settlement on those very tracts. That may be a valuable right to confer upon somebody, if it can be conferred.

The third section of the bill my colleague has made an attempt to restrain the mischiefs of—an attempt which I thought was going to be successful. There is a plain declaration in the third section that when lands have been granted to a State or to anybody conditionally and the time for complying with the conditions has elapsed, and they are not fully complied with, no matter what the excuses may be, no matter what the reasons may be, upon the mere lapse of time, if the vessels have not come to port, then send the Commissioner for "the pound of flesh;" then tell the Commissioner to enforce the forfeiture. When my colleague proposed to strike out one clause "or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions," that was, with an exhibition of grace which I have not seen equaled since this debate commenced, readily acceded to by the honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] "So far as I am concerned," he said, "let that amendment be made!" Certainly! Why be made? Because it does not restrict the operation of the section one particle; the lapse of time is still there, and the law will still say to the Commissioner "We waive the question of default; we waive all the reasons which may be urged in excuse of default; if you find that the given number of years have passed and the conditions have not been fully complied with, go to your work and strip the grantee, enforce the forfeiture." That is what the third section says, and says still, notwithstanding the amendment you have put upon it.

I am inclined to think, Mr. President, that I shall have to go on the record as an enemy of this bill; that is to say, as an opponent of it. It is hard, but it seems to be necessary. I admit with the Senator from Iowa that the bill has been pending a great while. Since the debate closed last night I have taken occasion to look into the history of it. I find that it passed the House of Representatives in the first session of the last Congress; that it came here, that it was reported at the last session by the Public Lands Committee, that there were a couple of languid attempts made in the morning hour to get consideration to it, quite languid; nobody seemed to have any opposition to the bill and nobody seemed to be in favor of it particularly. It was then as now, I believe, in charge of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. HARVEY.] He was unquestionably in favor of it, and in a very becoming way, as he does everything, he asked the attention of the Senate to it in the morning hour, and then it passed from the consideration of the Senate forever—for that session, I mean. At this session there seems to have a change come over the character of the bill or of the Senate. The friends of the bill are multiplied, and their earnestness and zeal is greatly increased, so much so that I hate to array myself against them; but as I cannot see any good purpose to be subserved by this bill, as I fear a great many vicious purposes will be subserved by it, and as I think I know it is designed to wrest from the State of Wisconsin an enormous penalty, not as the consequence of any offense she has ever committed, I shall vote against the passage of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, in the conclusion of his remarks the Senator from Wisconsin has called attention to a very important clause in the third section of this bill, which seems to have escaped notice in anything that I have heard from the Senators supporting it. I confess that I could hardly believe the Senator was correct until I looked at the bill and found that he is quite correct in his statement of one single sentence in the third section of the bill. The third section reads:

> That all such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant at a time subsequent to expiration of such grant—

Now mark it, up to that time there is one substantive case; then comes another substantive case—> or when the grantee was in default in the performance of any of the conditions imposed by such grant.

Mr. SARGENT. Those words have been stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those words have been stricken out.

Mr. THURMAN. "Or when the grantee was in default?"

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. That obviates the very objection to which I was going to call the attention of the Senate, and which I supposed was the one that was remarked upon by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. That clause is struck out, but the previous words are left in. The power for the Commissioner to enforce the forfeiture if the time has expired is still there.

Mr. THURMAN. Then comes the other part of the clause, which puts it entirely within the discretion of the Land Department whether to forfeit a land grant or not. That is what that does. Take the grant to the State of Wisconsin, about which something has been said. That has been before the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court has decided that the effect of the act of Congress in that case was to vest the legal title to the land in the State of Wisconsin; that it was a grant in præsenti, but it was a grant upon a condition, a defeasible grant upon condition that the road should be constructed within so many years. Then, say the Supreme Court, nobody but the Government can take advantage of the non-performance of that condition; no stranger to the grant can take advantage of the non-performance of that condition; and hence there could be no pre-emption as was decided in the case already cited, the Government not having taken any steps to put an end to that grant for the failure of the condition.

Then what say the Supreme Court further? They say that in order to put an end to it the right of the Government "must be asserted by judicial proceeding authorized by law," * * * "or there must be some legislative assertion of ownership of the property for breach of the condition, such as an act directing the possession and appropriation of the property, or that it be offered for sale or settlement." Now, admitting that it would be perfectly competent, as certainly it would according to this opinion of the Supreme Court, for Congress to declare that these lands shall now be considered as belonging to the United States, to have reverted to the United States, and that they shall be open to pre-emption, or homestead, or the like, this bill seems to confer that power, which the Supreme Court says ought to be exercised by Congress, upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office. If he makes rules and regulations for homestead settlements upon these lands, then the forfeiture is enforced. If he does not make them, then the forfeiture is not enforced.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him for information whether the section is not open to a larger construction than that which he puts upon it? He says, as I think he is entirely right in saying, that this section gives to the Commissioner of the General Land Office the right to say that these lands within a grant the time of which has expired shall be open to pre-emption. Does it not say that the pre-emptor may go upon the lands even under the general rules of the Department?

Mr. THURMAN. That may be.

> All such pre-emption and homestead entries which may have been made by permission of the Land Department, or in pursuance of the rules and instructions thereof, within the limits of any land grant.

I do not know what these rules and instructions are. They may be the general rules and instructions of the Department and not the specific rules in respect to this particular body of land. I cannot tell how that matter is; I do not know.

Mr. President, while it is obvious that a majority of the Senate favor a bill having for its purpose what this bill is intended for, while there probably, against such a bill properly drawn, would not be one single vote in the Senate, I think we are pushing things with a little haste and without due care in pressing this bill to a vote now; and thinking so I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARVEY. I hope that motion will not be agreed to.

Several SENATORS. It is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

The question being put, the Chair announced 22 in the affirmative and 23 in the negative.

Mr. CONKLING. If the vote is so close, I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, English, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Kernan, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Randolph, Robertson, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Dorsey, Ferry, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Oglesby, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Withers, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Cragin, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Gordon, Morton, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—20.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 44, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dorsey, English, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Sargent, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Morrill of Maine, and Robertson—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—19.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HARVEY. I rise to make a personal explanation. My friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] in his concluding remarks saw fit to charge me with giving a languid support to this bill at the last session. I think, Mr. President, that you and a number of other Senators here can bear witness that I have on every proper occasion urged to the extent of my ability the consideration of this measure, hoping to bring it to passage. It is not necessary to refer to particular times or days; but the record will bear me out, and the remembrance of Senators will bear me out in that statement.

I wish to say further to my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, to prevent similar misapprehension in the future, that what may seem to him very languid support may, owing to a difference of temperament, be for me a very energetic one. Few Senaters are possessed of the energy that my friend the Senator from Wisconsin possesses. It is well known that astronomers in making calculations make an allowance for what they call the personal equation. Some of their observers are much more acute and exhibit much more energy in recognizing and recording the results of their observations than others. That must be considered, as I say, as owing to the difference in our temperament. To be sure, I was for a while under the impression that my friend from Wisconsin showed an extraordinary energy, an energy that I could only account for by the remembrance of an anecdote that I read some years ago about a certain passenger who, going along the highway, came to a young man who was dancing very energetically about a load of hay he had been driving which had been overthrown. The passer-by could see no necessity for such anxiety and solicitude. He said, "Why do you make such a great ado about this matter? It is but a little matter, this load of hay happening to fall over." "Well," said he, "I don't care a cent about the hay, but dad's under it." [Laughter.] The Senator from Wisconsin seemed to labor under the impression that the State of Wisconsin was being attacked and wronged in this bill. I thought all along that he was mistaken. I am glad to see that the Senate agrees with me in that matter. I am sure no Senator here would have any disposition to do any wrong to the State of Wisconsin or any of her Senators.

I hope my friend will do me the justice to retract what he said about my languid support of this bill at a former session.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, Mr. President, if I do not retract that I shall never retract anything in the world. [Laughter.] I not only want to record my evidence here, but on reflection I think the Senator gave the bill last session and the session before last, as this session, the most energetic support consistent with his temperament [laughter] that a bill could have. But I want to testify also that I am persuaded he will always in the future give every bill that he advocates just such an ardent support as that. If I displayed more activity in opposition than he did in affirmation, he has rightly detected the cause. I did it thinking my State was under the load. If I can feel at liberty to construe the vote of the Senate as he construes it, into a declaration that the load really is not on top of any of my relatives, I shall feel much more gratified than I do at the passage of the bill, or rather—I want to speak more accurately—I shall feel less mortified than I otherwise would at the passage of the bill. I did not mean to say a word, however, that would put my friend from Kansas in any false attitude.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House joint resolution No. 52, for the payment of the interest on the 3.65 bonds.

Mr. CONKLING. With a view of going on to-day or to leave it as the unfinished business?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Simply to take it up, so that it may be left as the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the Senate adjourn

Mr. CONOVER. I hope the Senator will allow me to introduce two bills.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object. The Senator can introduce them to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 27, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JOHN M. ENGLISH.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for action at the present time a joint resolution in favor of John M. English, of North Carolina.

The joint resolution, which was read, proposes to instruct the Secretary of the Interior to direct the pension agent at Raleigh, North Carolina, to issue duplicate check No. 8424 for $1,334, in favor of John M. English, for one lost in the mail on the 18th of May, 1875.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I think this resolution had better be considered by a committee.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I can explain, if the gentleman will allow me, so that I think there will be no necessity for referring the resolution to a committee. I have an affidavit of the soldier—who was a member of North Carolina Volunteers in the United States service—in which he states that the check did not come to hand. I have also an affidavit of the postmaster where he lives, and the affidavit of the pension agent at Raleigh, North Carolina, setting forth the fact that the check was issued and has never been presented to the national bank at Raleigh for payment.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I do not waive my objection. Allow me say that I do not antagonize the gentleman's proposition; but as a rule, I think it is an unsafe method of legislation for the House to act in this way upon a proposition of this sort, which ought not to be acted on except upon the responsibility of a committee of the House. That is my reason for objecting to the present consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move a reference of the resolution to any committee?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I ask that it go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PROFESSOR ORTON'S GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEY.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution relative to Professor Orton's geographical and scientific survey.

The joint resolution, which was read, declares in the preamble that Professor James Orton, of Vassar College, proposes to make a geographical and scientific survey of the valley of the Upper Madiera, South America, and of the Rio Beni in particular, a region whose commercial development promises to be of immense direct value to the United States. The resolution therefore authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to render Professor Orton such aid in furnishing instruments and transportation on the Pacific coast between Panama and Southern Peru as can be done without injury to the naval service.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think this ought to go to a committee.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I ask, then, that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 54) was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to a question of privilege. The day before yesterday the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE,] at the expiration of the time allowed him, asked to be permitted to print the balance of his remarks upon the centennial celebration. To that request I deemed it proper to enter my objections, unless the gentleman would strike out of his remarks the sentences therein which reflected upon the character of his predecessor, who is now an officer of this House. The gentleman from Kentucky did strike from his remarks some of the obnoxious sentences which I pointed out; but one of them was allowed to remain.

Now, inasmuch as the printed RECORD of yesterday did not report the objection which was made by me, but did retain a portion of the personal allusions, and inasmuch as the rejected sentences were heard by the House but unanswered, I deem it just that all of these sentences be struck from the bound RECORD; and, moreover, the friends of the Clerk of the House regard it as just that there be made in the presence of the House a denial of the statements contained in the sentences of the gentleman from Kentucky which were objected to by me.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the sentences not as yet stricken out from the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky be stricken from the bound volume of the RECORD; and I also ask that an opportunity may be given for a gentleman of the Kentucky delegation to make a single statement in reply to allusions made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] touching the character of an officer of this House.

Mr. WHITE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] what remarks he refers to? I would like to state in.

the presence of the House that when the gentleman made his objections I did not then know exactly what he referred to. I took my manuscript to him, read over to him the very page that he desired to have stricken out, and struck it out in his presence. I then asked him if he was satisfied, and he said he was. I gave him my manuscript, and he himself gave it to the reporters. If anything is now in the RECORD that was objected to by the gentleman from Minnesota, I am not aware of it; and he has to blame himself.

Mr. DUNNELL. The sentence preceding the part stricken out is a sentence as objectionable as those that were stricken out. It is due to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] to say that he did not object to the erasures that were made; and perhaps if I had more particularly looked at the sentence which was not stricken out, I would myself have asked him to erase that also. But, inasmuch as that was said in connection with the sentence which was stricken out, I think the gentleman from Kentucky himself will admit that at least it is proper that sentence should also be stricken out—I mean the sentence referring to the "back-pay-salary grab."

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the remarks be read for the information of the House which the gentleman from Minnesota objects to.

Mr. WHITE. I ask why the gentleman objects to my reference to the "back-pay-salary grab?" I did not mean to refer to the gentleman from Minnesota. I was merely making a comparison, and if you strike out the clause in reference to the salary grab it will spoil the sentence, and several preceding sentences must be stricken out. I will appeal to the House before it is stricken out.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the sentence which refers to the salary law contains words something like these: that the experience of his predecessor upon that law was such and such, evidently referring to a loss of reputation at home on the part of his predecessor because of that law. That sentence was used in connection with other sentences relating to his military character, and I insist that an officer of this House whose military record is thus publicly attacked should have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the exceptionable words be read for the information of the House.

Mr. HOAR. By what right is this proceeding; is it by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. Then I believe I must object.

Mr. FORT. I think in behalf of amnesty we have already had enough of this.

Mr. KNOTT. Do gentlemen object to a simple act of justice to an officer of the House who has no right to come here in person to speak for himself after his reputation is assailed?

Mr. HOAR. I will not object if there has been any attack on his reputation. I understood some one said something about the "salary grab," as it was called.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, if I have the floor I will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I will waive my objection if there is any such thing as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Before the gentleman proceeds I wish to ask what the proposition is before the House. Is it to strike out words actually used in debate and which were used at the time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. FORT. I understand this discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. FORT. If there is anything which can possibly do my friend any good I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. KNOTT. Day before yesterday, Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the centennial bill, my colleague of the ninth district of Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE,] for some reason best known to himself, took occasion to say—

> Members from Pennsylvania and the East may excuse their action on the ground that their section of the country received money. If they do, let me tell them they should profit by the experience of my predecessor, who, in a public speech, justified his vote on the back-pay-salary grab on the ground that he took the salary grab but his friends got all the money.

Mr. WHITE. Let me interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. KNOTT. I do not want to be interrupted; I am proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE. Does he wish to have those words stricken out?

Mr. KNOTT. I have the floor by unanimous consent, and do not wish to be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor, and will please proceed without interruption.

Mr. KNOTT. I do not understand what the gentleman meant by saying that gentlemen from Pennsylvania might profit by the experience of his predecessor. If he meant to convey the idea that his predecessor had any unpleasant experience on account of any vote he ever gave while a member of this House, I simply desire to say that while his constituents may not have approved of every vote he gave, yet it is not only the universal regret of the democracy of his district but of all the democracy throughout the entire State of Kentucky that he declined a renomination. I will add that it is perhaps as well for the gentleman who now occupies the seat he did not accept it.

The gentleman went further and said, in the presence of gentlemen who are within the sound of my voice:

> This was the excuse of my honorable predecessor, who joined the Federal Army to fight the rebels, as he said, until hell froze over, but who afterward resigned his commission, and damned the free-nigger government in time to be baptized into the rebel church and become the successful candidate for the Clerkship of this House.

His time having expired before he had completed the reading of his written speech, he asked the unanimous consent of the House that his remarks might be printed in the RECORD. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] objected unless these personal reflections upon an officer of this House, who had no right to come here and defend himself, should be withdrawn, for which I am sure he has the thanks of every high-minded gentleman, and we are all high-minded gentlemen on this floor.

What I desire to say, simply for the vindication of the Clerk of this House, is, that the gentleman who now represents the ninth district of Kentucky knew, or ought to have known, that Mr. Adams entered the service of his country in the Union Army early in the conflict. He did resign, for the reasons set forth in his letter of resignation, and which were entirely satisfactory to the Government. He shortly thereafter accepted another position in the Army, which he held as a faithful, valiant, honorable officer until the very close of the conflict; and that there never was and there never can be any truthful imputation upon his fidelity, his patriotism, or his loyalty made upon this floor or anywhere else. I deem this just to an honorable gentleman who has no power to be heard here himself; and I say it not only for his benefit, but for the benefit of gentlemen on both sides of the House who knew him here for eight years.

Mr. HALE. I think the reflection, to anybody not specially interested in this case by acquaintance with either of the gentlemen, may be a query as to what this is all about.

Mr. FORT. Yes; that is it.

Mr. HALE. As I understand it, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE,] in response to the objection of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] did strike out certain objectionable words that he had uttered in reference to the present Clerk of the House. The gentleman from Kentucky submitted his manuscript to the gentleman from Minnesota, who was acting as the friend of the present Clerk of the House, who is a pleasant gentleman, and whose feelings none of us would desire to be hurt. The gentleman from Minnesota looked over that manuscript and all was struck out that he requested, and the manuscript was taken by him to the reporter, and as emasculated or corrected appears in the RECORD.

Now after that, why this House should be called upon to entertain a question of privilege, or why the gentleman from Kentucky on my right [Mr. WHITE] should be further arraigned because it happened that he referred to the late member from Kentucky, the present Clerk of the House, as having been interested in the salary-grab vote, so called, or why we should be called further to meddle with the RECORD, is a thing that passes my comprehension. The attention of the House was called to the matter by a friend of the Clerk. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] submitted the manuscript to him. He corrected the manuscript, and as corrected it went into the RECORD, and so appears; and I say again, why should we be called upon to listen to this matter again as a question of privilege passes my comprehension.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me a moment to answer his question?

Mr. HALE. I shall be very glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman's question. This is not an effort on the part of any gentleman in this House to arraign the member from the ninth district of Kentucky. But the question which was suggested was this, whether it was a breach of privilege for a member on this floor, entitled to all its privileges, to go to work in an elaborately prepared speech, a portion of which has been read by my colleague from Kentucky——

Mr. HALE. That was struck out, as I understand.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will come to that in a moment. I say that the question which was suggested was this: Whether it is competent for a member of this House to go to work in a deliberate and carefully prepared speech and cast aspersions on an officer of the House, a man who is here under the orders of the House and certainly should be under its protection. No member on the other side of the House heard those aspersions. I am glad to have the opportunity of saying that if I had heard what fell from the gentleman representing the ninth district of Kentucky it would have been my duty as well as it would have been my pleasure to repel the charge, and by a statement of the facts to have silenced the accuser. But, sir, for the rebuke he received, for rebuked he was, we are indebted to the knightly courtesy of a gentleman of his own party.

Now, sir, this was not brought to the attention of the House the other day, nor has it been brought to the attention of the House again, by any friend of the Clerk. It has been again called to the attention of the House by that same member on the republican side of the House who objected to the courtesy of printing the remainder of his remarks being extended to the member from Kentucky, as he stated to the House, unless those personal reflections were expunged. That, sir, the gentleman from Minnesota tells us, and the RECORD proves it, was not done in accordance with a compact entered into and sought by the gentleman from Kentucky himself.

Mr. HALE. Did not the gentleman from Minnesota himself examine the manuscript and take it to the reporter, and was it not corrected according to his directions at the time?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Whether he examined the record hastily or not at the time, I take upon that point the statements of the gentleman from Minnesota to-day.

Mr. WHITE. May I interrupt the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] for a moment—only for a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE. I would like the gentleman from Kentucky, before he shoots off any further, to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if I did not read the manuscript over to him and strike out everything he objected to?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Minnesota has stated on this floor this morning that the agreement between the gentleman from Kentucky and himself was that personal reflections should be expunged from the manuscript and that that was not done, and the RECORD so shows.

Now, sir, I have nothing to add to the vindication that my colleague [Mr. KNOTT] has made in behalf of the Clerk of this House. I am glad to have an opportunity of attesting every word uttered in his commendation. I have but this to say in conclusion, that I am satisfied that the time will come when in the sober judgment of the member from the ninth district of Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] and the constituency which has honored him with their suffrages they will regret the step that he has taken in this matter, for it has always been claimed that whatever faults his constituents may have they are not lacking in a bold and sturdy manhood.

The manner in which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] managed to have the objections of the gentleman from Minnesota withdrawn was not creditable to his candor.

I do not approve, sir, of gentlemen on this floor making personal attacks upon a man who is not permitted to reply. And it is to the courtesy of the gentleman from Minnesota that we are indebted for this opportunity to repel the attack which has been made upon him.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman if he will read the additional words about which all this fuss is made, so that we may know what they amount to?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I deny the imputation that there has been any "fuss," as the gentleman says.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman does not like the word, I will ask him to read the additional words that the gentleman from Minnesota objected to and wishes to have stricken out.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will. I say this, that as I understand the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] in accordance with the contract entered into and the agreement made with the gentleman from the ninth district of Kentucky, these words should have gone out of the RECORD:

> Members from Pennsylvania and the East may excuse their action on the ground that their section of country received the money. If they do, let me tell them that they should profit by the experience of my predecessor—

That is certainly offensive and a criticism on the character of an officer of this House. But that is not all—> who in a public speech justified his vote on the back-pay salary grab on the ground that "he took the salary-grab, but his friends got all the money."

My point is this, that the gentleman from the ninth district of Kentucky agreed with the gentleman from Minnesota that he would strike out everything in his speech that was reflective at all upon an officer of this House.

Mr. WHITE. I did not agree to any such thing.

Mr. BLACKBURN. He has placed this in the RECORD.

Mr. FRYE. It is simply a charge about the "salary-grab," and no man need be tender about that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is charged that the present Clerk of the House by reason of his vote on this bill had suffered before his constituency; a charge which the democracy of Kentucky repudiate.

Mr. HALE. But suppose the gentleman referred to suffered by his vote on the salary bill, had not the gentleman from the ninth district of Kentucky a right to refer to it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; because it was not a fact.

Mr. HALE. That is for the people of Kentucky to determine. But I have yet to learn something, for one, of the privileges of this House if the gentleman from Kentucky had not the right to say that his predecessor suffered from his vote on the salary bill. We shall certainly be very much limited in debate if we cannot say such a thing as that.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Ah, the gentleman from Kentucky is a young man and alone from Kentucky in his party, and that is the difficulty with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUNNELL. My motion is that the sentence which was read here, preceding the sentences which were stricken out, be stricken out of the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, let me state that the gentleman from Maine has alluded to me as a friend of the Clerk of the House. I am no more a friend of the Clerk than any other gentlem n on this floor. But when I heard the words read here which were stricken out I deemed them inelegant, inappropriate, and improper, and I objected to them. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is correct in saying that he struck out those sentences in my presence and that I myself took his speech as amended to the reporters. I ask the gentleman now if he will not admit that I told him he ought to strike out the sentence which he refused to strike out?

Mr. WHITE. That is correct; but did I not make the remark that it would destroy the comparison which I was making, and did not the gentleman admit that fact and did not insist on striking out that sentence?

Mr. DUNNELL. Not quite that.

Mr. WHITE. You said you would like to have me cut it out, but you did not insist upon it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I stated to him that I desired him to strike that out because of its connection with the other objectionable remarks.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] can only be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Then I object to it.

EULOGIES OF VICE-PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. HOAR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read, and, under the law, referred to the joint Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That there be printed 20,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two branches of Congress upon the late Vice-President Wilson: 15,000 for the use of the House and 5,000 for the use of the Senate.

SOUTHERN MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be respectfully requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a statement showing the amount due contractors for carrying the United States mails in Southern States at the beginning of the civil war, and which has not been paid in consequence of such contractors being unable to take the oath required by law.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to the adoption of the resolution, but not to its reference.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I see no necessity for its reference; it is merely a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. As it calls for executive information and objection is made to its present consideration, it must lie over one day under the rule.

10 PER CENT. REDUCTION OF CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House of Representatives whether the repeal of section 2503 of the Revised Statutes has been followed by a diminished importation of the articles to which the 10 per cent. reduction provided in that section applied, and whether the quarterly returns succeeding such repeal, compared with the returns from the corresponding quarter prior thereto, show any and how much increase or diminution of customs revenue from the articles upon which the duty was increased by such repeal.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 626) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to naturalization; and

An act (H. R. No. 1561) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasurer of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twelve minutes before one o'clock, and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature.

PRINTING OF ELECTION TESTIMONY.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee on Elections to ask the House to order the printing of papers in the following contested-election cases: Platt vs. Goode, second congressional district of Virginia, and BREUX vs. Darrall, third congressional district of Louisiana.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

Mr. MORRISON. The Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred House bill No. 1099, to reduce the salaries of all executive and legislative officers of the Government, have instructed me to report the same back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I am also instructed by the same committee, to which was referred House bill No. 1225, providing compensation of members of Congress, to report the same back and move to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The motion was agreed to.

WORK ON CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1530) to remedy an error in enrollment; which was read a first and second time.

The preamble to the bill states that in the sundry civil appropriation bill approved March 3, 1875, the sum of $50,000 was made available from the passage of the act, but the clause relating to the immediate availability of that sum was omitted in engrossing said act.

The bill provides that the sum of $6,699.18, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay liabilities incurred during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, for labor, &c., in the improvement of the Capitol grounds, shall be rendered available for that purpose, to be paid out of the funds provided in said bill approved March 3, 1875, for the improvement of the Capitol grounds.

Mr. WHEELER. The bill explains itself. If there be no objection, I ask that it be now considered and passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DE WITT C. SENTER.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1591) to pay De Witt C. Senter, of Tennessee, mileage and per diem for appearing under summons as a witness before a committee of the Forty-third Congress; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

HORACE GLOVER.

Mr. TARBOX, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, bill (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 84) to establish a department of commerce; which was laid on the table.

SIGNAL STATION ON BLOCK ISLAND.

Mr. HEREFORD also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the petition of Cutler, Thatcher & Co., and others, for the establishment of a signal station on Block Island, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MAILING OBSCENE BOOKS, ETC.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with an amendment in the form of a substitute the bill (H. R. No. 1239) to amend sections 3893 and 3894 of the Revised Statutes providing a penalty for mailing obscene books and other matters therein contained and prohibiting lottery circulars passing through the mails.

The substitute, which was read, provides that section 3893 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

Any obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, print, or other publication of an indecent character, or any article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion; or any article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use or nature; or any written or printed card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind, giving information, directly or indirectly, where, or how, or of whom, or by what means any matter herein declared to be non-mailable matter may be obtained or made; or any letter upon the envelope of which, or postal-card upon which, indecent or scurrilous epithets may be written or printed, are hereby declared non-mailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in or delivered by mail; and any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery any matter declared by this section to be non-mailable matter, to be conveyed or delivered by mail in violation of this section, or any notice or paper containing any advertisement relating to any such matter to be conveyed or delivered by mail, and any person who, in pursuance of any plan or scheme for disposing of any such matter, shall take or cause to be taken the same from the mail, or who shall in any other way violate any of the provisions of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall for each and every offense be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The bill further provides that section 3894 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the word "illegal" in the first line of that section.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Unless some explanation of the bill be desired by some gentleman, I will ask that it be put at once on its passage.

Mr. CONGER. While I approve of the general object of this bill, it seems to me that its provisions in regard to mailing and receiving papers containing advertisements calling attention to any of the articles or matters referred to are not sufficiently explicit. If I understand the bill correctly from its reading, it provides that any person who shall mail or shall receive a paper in which any of the articles or things enumerated in that bill may be referred to even as an advertisement shall be liable to the penalty imposed as for a misdemeanor.

Now, the object of the old law to which this is an amendment was to exclude from the mails a certain class of obscene, vulgar literature—pictures, advertisements, &c. This bill provides that any paper containing a reference to the place where any of these prohibited or enumerated articles may be found shall come within the rule; and any paper containing such an advertisement which may be received by any one subjects the receiver of that paper to the penalty prescribed.

While I would not desire—far from it—to take away the effect of any such law or to prevent its full execution upon all persons who use the mails or the advertising columns of any paper to disseminate vulgar or indecent communications, prints, or articles, yet I think the bill is not sufficiently guarded as to those who may mail or receive any such a paper while innocent of any knowledge of the objectionable advertisement

In connection with this question I desire to make one additional remark. The power given by this law to every one of the thousands of postmasters throughout the country to interfere for the purposes named with the correspondence of the people or their newspapers is a great power, apparently in violation of the assured rights of the citizens; but it is exercised for a great and very worthy purpose, and seems to be necessary to preserve the youth of the country from immoral contagion. While I would do nothing to lessen the effect of such a law, yet I would have it so guarded that it might not involve the innocent with the guilty.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] I would state that the proposed bill in no wise changes the law as it now is except to provide a penalty for the circulation of obscene literature. By an oversight in drafting the original section the penalty applies only to the disposition of articles circulated or sold for the purpose of procuring abortion or preventing conception. Already this obscene class of matter spoken of in the other portion of the section is prohibited from passing through the mails, but no penalty is provided.

I will state also to the gentleman that he has misconceived the provisions of the proposed amendment. It was considered very fully and very carefully by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and it does not provide a penalty for a party receiving a publication or an advertisement of this kind unless he knowingly and willfully receives it in pursuance of a scheme to disseminate this kind of literature. The bill is very carefully guarded in that respect. The gentleman seems to suppose that if he or anybody else were to receive an advertisement containing a reference to obscene literature and stating where it might be obtained, he would be guilty of a misdemeanor under this bill.

Not so; he must receive that paper or advertisement in pursuance of the scheme or conspiracy entered into, which must be proved on indictment on his part as well as the part of others to dispose of that kind of literature.

Mr. CONGER. The bill not having been printed and therefore not open to examination, I gathered from hearing it read that it embraced all who send or receive such advertisements. With the explanation of the gentleman, if that is the character of the bill, I have no objection to its passage.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the description in his bill "of things adapted for any indecent or immoral purpose" is not a little too broad? The bill makes any article adapted for any immoral purpose non-mailable, and the sending or receipt of it punishable by severe imprisonment or fine, in the discretion of the court. Now, what courts or juries may in times of political excitement regard as newspapers adapted for immoral purpose, or the postmaster may so regard, is somewhat doubtful. There was a time when throughout a large section of this country every newspaper which thought slavery was wrong was considered immoral and taken from the mails by the postmaster. If the gentleman would use the phrase "indecent or illegal purposes," because every scurrilous, obscene, and indecent libel is illegal at common law, that would be a safer phrase. But, sir, I do not like by any crude suggestion to interfere with a bill reported by a gentlemen of the distinction of the gentleman from Illinois, and which has been carefully considered by a committee. Still I think it is a safer way to express it, "indecent or illegal purpose."

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts I have this to say, that it in no way changes the section as it now is. It makes nothing non-mailable that is not now non-mailable. It merely provides a penalty.

I do not think the section can receive the construction the gentleman from Massachusetts anticipates. It is clearly, when you come to read the section, a provision for the prevention of obscene literature circulating through the mail. Of course, that being the object of the section, it would cover obscene literature and such articles as are construed to be adapted for indecent and immoral purposes. I have no doubt that such would be the construction from a careful reading of the bill as well as of the original section.

And let me say, Mr. Speaker, that what we want is a bill sharply drawn on this question, so that it will cover almost any conceivable kind of obscene literature, for if there is one evil more than another, I think, now in the country which is sapping and corrupting the morals of the youth of the country, it is this thing of circulating surreptitiously through the mails and otherwise this class of obscene literature. I think it does more harm every year than all the pulpits are able to do good, if I may be permitted to make that kind of comparison.

Nor, sir, does this bill give any right to any postmaster to open or to interfere with anybody's mail. It is like anything else, before you can convict, you must offer and make proof. I hope the bill will now be put upon its passage.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to a single point. I was not in at the time the bill was introduced and do not know how far it modifies the language of the old law. I understood him to say that it only provided for penalties. I wish to call his attention to a case I have been informed was recently decided in one of the courts in New York, in which the person was imprisoned in the penitentiary for a series of years for being the publisher of a journal in which appeared a crazy contribution from George Francis Train, wholly theological in its character, in reference to the doctrine of the Trinity, in which not an obscene or surrilous word was used at all. Although the judge stated, as I am informed, to the jury that it could not be called obscene literature nor scurrilous, yet it was blasphemous in the highest degree, and on that statement the jury found the publisher guilty and he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. It has occurred to me, when the act we passed for a very proper purpose last year is liable to constructions of this character, that we thereby enter the domain of theological opinion, bringing down upon men the odium theologicum—which is perhaps worse than political odium when passion is aroused—we ought to be exceedingly careful in all our legislation touching this subject.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, as a complaint made in a very reputable quarter of the practical operation of the law of last year. For instance, I doubt if the word "scurrilous" has been so construed by the courts that a lawyer can say precisely what it means; how wide the term is; how much it covers. There would be so great difference of opinion among men as to what is "scurrilous," that we probably in the use of that word would cover ground that many of us would be unwilling to cover. Where freedom of opinion and of the press lie on the border of obscenity is a difficult question to determine, and I for one would be glad if the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads would consent to the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, not because I have anything against my friend's amendment, but in order that they may go over the whole subject and inquire whether we have not used terms too broad and too general in the original bill, that no wrong may be done while we are trying to achieve the good which the bill was intended to accomplish.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask that the bill may be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I hope that the bill will be recommitted. I ask especially that it may be recommitted, and that I may be called personally before the committee to prove to them by a very recent transaction that it is improper to pass any such amendment. I pledge myself to show them a special case of oppression against an honorable and an innocent man, which requires that the law shall be amended in a very different way from the amendment proposed in this bill. I hope that without further discussion on my part it may be recommitted.

Mr. WADDELL. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does he refer to the case of Dr. Richau?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I refer to a case which has occurred within a fortnight past in Brooklyn. I have been communicated with by most honorable gentlemen there in regard to it; and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. HARRISON. From hearing the bill read I cannot think in accordance with the explanation given by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] that the construction of this bill will demand that papers with objectionable advertisements, for example, should be sent for a specific purpose. I may be mistaken, but it seems to me that any person sending a paper with advertisements calling attention to places in large cities where abortions are procured would be liable under this bill.

Now, sir, this bill attaches a penalty, and a very grave penalty, to the offense. It is notorious that the severities of penalties are often used to prevent provisions of law being carried into effect. The very fact that you enact a penalty that will strike courts and juries as oppressive beyond the requirements of the case prevents the execution of the law and makes it a dead letter.

Therefore it does seem to me that this bill or amendment should be recommitted, and I think that instead of amending the law so as to make it more severe, it should be amended in such a way that judges and juries will exact the full penalties of the law, and not make them nugatory by passing over the offenses because of the penalties.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have this to say about the bill, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] as well as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] that no law was ever enacted and enforced the enforcement of which did not at some time or another, perhaps, work hardship upon some individual. Men will be unjustly convicted sometimes. These provisions may sometimes bear hardly upon a man. There is a discretion, however, given to the court, of imposing a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and imprisonment or not, as the court may choose on a full hearing of the case. The gentleman from Illinois said he did not think that under this bill he could safely send a paper. If he turns to line 17 he will find that the offense consists in knowingly sending this class of matter.

Mr. BLAND. How will that answer in the case of papers containing important trials, as the Beecher trial, for example?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If there be a trial in this country or anywhere else of an obscene character—of that character that a report of it would corrupt the morals of the youth and the morals of the country generally—then I do not think the United States should provide the means to circulate that kind of literature in whatever paper or in whatever book it may be published.

Mr. HARRISON. Who is to be the judge of that?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I would suggest, as there have been a number of points raised in regard to this bill which ought to be very carefully considered and that were to some extent possibly not taken into consideration by the committee, that my colleague accept the suggestion made by a number of gentlemenn, that the bill be printed and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly. On the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I am willing to have that order made.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say one word before that question is put. I find now by looking at the bill that the provision in regard to any plan or scheme for disposing of non-mailable matter of this class applies only to the receiving.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There is a provision about sending, in another part of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I am aware that it is provided that any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposted for mailing any such matter is made liable. But that part of the bill which has reference to schemes for disposing of any such matter relates only to those who receive, and not to those who send. Now, when a man openly mails a document containing advertisements of the nature described the presumption in the eye of the law is that he knows it. I object to the bill, as I did in my former remarks, on that account.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say a word on the motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, the press of the country a few years ago was thrown into a state of intense excitement by a bill introduced by Judge Poland, of Vermont, which provided for the giving up or the rendition to be tried in this District of the publishers of newspapers published elsewhere which should contain libels; and they were, in my judgment, quite right. It was entirely contrary to sound principle that the publishers of a newspaper printed in New York, although it might be sent to the District here, should be tried for a political libel in a community which is made up so largely of the holders of offices under the dominant administration, although it is quite proper that as between the States that transfer should be made. The instinct which led the press of the country to object to that application of that principle as between the States and the District of Columbia was a sound one.

But this bill, in my judgment, on examining it more carefully, very clearly exposes the press of the country to a danger a hundred-fold greater that the one which was contained in the bill which was passed by inadvertence on the report of Mr. Poland, of Vermont, in the last Congress. Whenever a jury in any locality in the country shall find that a paper contains matter which may be devoted to a purpose which they deem immoral—not only indecent, but immoral—the jury may convict the man who sends the paper or the man who receives it by mail, and the postmaster is authorized to exclude that newspaper from the mail.

Now, I am aware that the answer which the gentleman made, when I intimated this objection in the form of a question, that the same objection applies to the original text of the Revised Statutes, is a good answer. This bill is no worse in this particular than the law which it undertakes to amend. The same objection applies to both; but as the bill is to be recommitted and the committee are to draft a new law if they may see fit, I desire to bring out these points in their hearing and in the hearing of the House in order that the new law may correct a great danger to which the existing law subjects the press and the people of the country.

Mr. COX. I favor the recommittal of this bill, and I desire to make one suggestion only. The word "scurrilous" is used in this bill with reference to postal-cards and the prohibition of any such cards being passed through the mails. I do not object to the purification of the mails, but I would like the committee when they reconsider this bill not to go too far in giving postmasters discretion. What may be scurrilous to one man would not be to another. The word "scurrilous" does not necessarily imply obscene or indecent. The word "indecent" is used in this bill, and that is all right; but the word "scurrilous" may mean "vile or mean, using the low and indecent language of the meaner sort of people, or such as only the license of buffoons can warrant;" and, as Macaulay says in one of his essays, a sermon may be scurrilous. It is a very indefinite word; it has no legal meaning or acceptation. I would suggest to my friends on the committee that they frame the bill so as to make words of legal import. I have no objection to the recommittal of the bill to the committee.

The bill was then recommitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the following petitions, with the recommendation that they be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The petition of Nancy M. Staples, widow of John Y. Staples, private Company E, Fifth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, in the war with Mexico.

Also, the petition of Melvina Ingle, widow of Henry Ingle.

CONSULS.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1593) to amend and re-enact section 4130 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill provides that section 4130 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same hereby is, amended by inserting after the words "consul-general" the words "vice-consul general;" so that the section shall read as follows:

SEC. 4130. The word "minister" when used in this title shall be understood to mean the person invested with and exercising the principal diplomatic functions; the word "consul" shall be understood to mean any person invested by the United States and exercising the functions of consul-general, vice-consul general, consul, or vice-consul.

Mr. DURHAM. I suggest that that is precisely the bill which was passed on a report of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws a few days since. If the gentleman who reports this bill will examine that bill, he will find that they are identical.

Mr. FAULKNER. The only purpose of this bill is to insert the words "vice-consul general" in that section of the Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. It is not the recollection of the Chair that the bills are identical.

Mr. DURHAM. I simply call attention of the Chair to the fact that they are identical.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this bill goes further than the other.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why it is certainly the same bill, unless there may be a word or two different.

Mr. DURHAM. It is identically the same bill. I do not remember the number of the bill, but if it is compared with this bill I am confident it will be found that the two are identical; and I object to needless legislation.

Mr. FAULKNER. I must insist upon the consideration of this bill at this time. We are advised from the Department of State that it is important, and it should be passed. We have direct information from that Department that this omission of the word "vice-consul general" in that section of the Revised Statutes has been the subject of great inconvenience, and this bill has been sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with a request that that committee will bring it immediately to the attention of the House. There were four of these officers—vice-consuls general—provided for by treaties with Turkey, Persia, China, and Japan. I have no doubt the word was inadvertently omitted in the section. The sole purpose of this bill is to restore the law to what it was before the Revised Statutes were passed and give to the vice-consul general the same power in the absence of the consul-general that a vice-consul now possesses in the absence of the consul.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the liberty of suggesting to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] that it has been stated by several members in the House that a bill identical in its provisions with this one was passed one day last week, upon the recommendation of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Permit me to say that I am a member of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and my recollection accords with that of the chairman of the committee [Mr. DURHAM] that this pending bill is identical with one which, upon the recommendation of that committee, has already passed this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for further examination.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have no objection to that.

The bill was accordingly recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DECAY OF COMMERCE.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the causes of the large balance of the carrying trade being against American shipping, and into the causes of the decay of American ship-building, and to report to the House.

PROSECUTION OF CLAIMS BEFORE THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House on yesterday recommitted to the Committee on Patents the bill (H. R. No. 1589) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes so as to provide that it shall not be lawful for any person holding office, after the passage of this act, as an officer, clerk, or employé in any of the Departments or Bureaus of the Government to act as counsel, attorney, or agent, or be interested directly or indirectly in any firm established for prosecuting either claims or patents, applications for which were pending in any of said Departments or Bureaus while he was such officer, clerk, or employé, or at any time prior thereto, nor in any manner nor by any means, directly or indirectly, to aid in the prosecution of any such claims or patents within two years next after he shall have ceased to be such officer, clerk, or employé.

The bill further provides in the second section that any person in the service of the United States violating the provisions of this act by recognizing any such officer, clerk, or employé in an application for a patent or prosecuting a claim against the United States as counsel, attorney, or agent shall be ipso facto discharged from the service of the United States.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I withdraw the motion to recommit.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOAR. It occurred to me as this bill was read—perhaps I am mistaken—that it made any public officer in the Departments who recognized as counsel a person who had been a clerk in the Department under the circumstances described amenable to this act, whether that officer was aware of the previous service of the prosecuting attorney or not. There does not seem to be any scientia required by the bill, and if so, I think it is a very harsh provision.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Permit me to make the further suggestion that there is no penalty provided for the person who acts as the attorney; he may commit all the mischief without any punishment at all. That is evidently wrong; there should be a penalty as well on the attorney who in violation of the spirit and purpose of this bill prosecutes the claim, as upon the officer of the Government who permits him to do so.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the bill will remain with the committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It provides that the officer recognizing the attorney shall "ipso facto be discharged from the service of the United States." How is he to be discharged? He continues in office until he is removed by some act of the power appointing him. It seems to me the bill is impracticable, that it fails to accomplish its purpose. The design is all right, I am in favor of it; but the bill fails to carry out the real object intended by it, as it seems to me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not consider myself responsible for this bill any further than as the chairman of the subcommittee and the organ of the committee directing it to be reported to the House. If the criticism the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has just pronounced against it is correct, that it provides no penalty for those parties who act as attorneys against the Government, the fault is not in this bill, but is in the original act declaring that such practices shall be unlawful in reference to all the other Departments except the Patent Office. It will be observed by the House that this bill proposes simply to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes, which already declares that the prosecution of claims against the Government by one who has been an officer or employé of the Government shall be an offense in reference to all the other Departments. The statute, at least in that section, provides no penalty. I presume that it was enacted by a Congress of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] was a member. He was satisfied at that time that it was sufficient, at least to that extent to guard the public interests against this practice.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to one fact? I suppose it is known to most of the members of the House that the Revised Statutes of the United States are simply a codification of the law as it existed on the first day of the session at which the revision was passed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am aware of that.

Mr. HOAR. It required unanimous consent to pass every clause of those Revised Statutes; for at the evening sessions, when they were acted on, there was not in any instance a quorum present.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Without intending the slightest discourtesy to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] I desire to say to him that I was apprised of what he has undertaken to inform me of, that the Revised Statutes are in fact a codification of the laws as they existed prior to that codification.

Mr. HOAR. I did not suppose the gentleman was ignorant of that; but several times there have been made in the House observations which indicated that perhaps some gentlemen did not recall the fact. Hence, I thought it proper to make the suggestion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the gentleman had allowed me to proceed without interruption, he would have discovered that I would have recalled the attention of the House to the fact referred to, so as to explain that the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio upon this bill is made a little too late. If there is any just ground for him to object to the bill because it does not provide a penalty to be inflicted upon those who shall attempt to practice before the Departments or Bureaus of the Government in violation of section 190, why was not the objection raised by him when this code came before the House for ratification and confirmation? That was the time for the gentleman to signify his objection and have the omission rectified.

The scope or object of the present amendment is simply to provide that the law, as embodied in the terms of section 190 of the Revised Statutes, shall apply to the Patent Office as well as to the other Bureaus or Departments of the Government. This amendment of the law is necessary, as we are informed by the Commissioner of Patents, to protect the interests of the service in that most important branch from a practice which has grown up of parties holding office for a few years, making themselves familiar with the business of the Office, and then retiring to engage in the patent practice. This has grown to be so great an evil in the estimation not only of the present Commissioner of Patents but some of his predecessors, that they have from time to time reported the matter to Congress. And what is the remedy which they have proposed? What is the corrective which they have suggested as a means of protecting this important branch of the public service from this growing evil? It has been uniformly to endeavor to retain efficient and valuable officers in the service, to prevent their going out of office and entering into this patent practice by increasing their salaries. We propose a different mode of attaining the same object; that is to prevent their practicing as patent attorneys for two years after their retirement from office in regard to any cases which were pending during the time of their tenure of office. This will prevent the evil if it has proved a corrective in regard to the practice of prosecuting claims in other Bureaus or Departments of the Government. I believe it was the intention of Congress, when this one hundred and ninetieth section was enacted, that the prosecution of patent claims should be embraced in the general terms of that law, but it has not been so construed. So far as that is concerned, I do not think the objection of the gentleman from Ohio holds good. There may be more in his objection or criticism as applied to the second section, but the effect of that, it strikes me, will only be to declare that if any officers of the Government——

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the gentleman to insert the word "knowingly" before the word "recognized."

Mr. DOUGLAS. If that can be agreed to by unanimous consent, so that the bill will not be retarded in its passage, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the modification will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman who has just taken his seat refers to some bill which was passed while I was a member of Congress. There was one congressional term within the last twelve years when, unfortunately for the country, I happened to be out of Congress.

Mr. DOUGLAS. You were in when this code was adopted.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then the gentleman has no occasion to explain or to defend himself. I say that the time when he ought to have raised the objection which he now raises to this bill was when this code was before the Congress of which he was a member.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My friend seems to forget that the committee which had in charge the Revised Statutes (of which I was a member) was not authorized to report any new law, but simply to report upon the law as they found it; in other words, to embody in the code the state of the law as it was.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand all that.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I agree entirely with the purpose of this bill, and it ought to be enlarged very much. The evil is not merely that the Commissioner of Patents goes out and becomes a practicing attorney after he has learned all the secrets and intricacies of the office, to urge claims for patents against the Government, but the Commissioner of the General Land Office does the same thing; the clerks and employés in all the Departments do the same thing.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do they under the present law?

Mr. LAWRENCE. They have been doing it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not yield to the gentleman from Ohio to make an argument against the bill, but merely to make a personal explanation. I have only a few words further to say.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I go for making this bill ample, in order to make it cover the case of every Government officer, so that no man shall educate himself in office at the public expense and qualify himself thereby to go out and prosecute claims of any character against the Government. I have had the honor to introduce a bill at this session of Congress (H. R. No. 451) the tenth section of which was designed to cover all classes of cases of this description.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to have it read.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That bill is now before the Judiciary Committee. I do not say it is perfect, but it was designed to accomplish the object the gentleman seeks.

Mr. HURLBUT. Does the gentleman from Ohio propose to deny to man the God-given right of resigning? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. "None die and few resign." [Laughter.] I ask the Clerk now to read the tenth section of my bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That it shall be unlawful for any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, or other officer, clerk, or employé of the Government, or any clerk or employé in any Department or Bureau, or in any office authorized by law, or the clerk of any committee of either House of Congress, or of any joint committee of the two Houses, otherwise than in the performance of a duty authorized or required by act of Congress, either while in office or within four years thereafter, to counsel, advise, advocate, or urge the payment or allowance of any account or claim, or other action or proceeding in favor thereof, against the United States, either before or to any member or committee of either House of Congress, or any joint committee of the two Houses, or any officer of the Government. But nothing herein shall apply to pension claims, or deny to any such Senator, Representative, officer, or clerk the right to give testimony in writing as to any account or claim, or to give an opinion in writing on the request of the head of any Department in which any such account or claim may be pending, or to any member of any committee in the performance of any duty as such, nor to any account or claim held by any such Senator, Representative, Delegate, officer, or clerk in his own right. Every person who shall offend against or violate any provision of this section shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $2,000, or imprisoned at hard labor for a term not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court. And if any officer authorized by law to receive, examine, or certify the amount of any account or claim shall so certify or recommend or advise payment thereof, without a careful examination thereof, and of all evidence filed or presented in support thereof, he shall in like manner be liable to fine and imprisonment as aforesaid.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not wish to say that is perfect, but it is before the Judiciary Committee, and will have the consideration of that committee.

Mr. HOAR. The State of Virginia has a claim against the United States, as I was informed the other day by a distinguished Representative formerly governor of that State. The State of Massachusetts also has a claim. Now, does this bill prevent the Representatives of either of those States from urging upon this floor, publicly or privately to their associates, those claims?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The bill I have the honor of presenting to this House from the Committee on Patents does not refer to members of this House at all. The gentleman from Ohio says he has introduced a bill and has had it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know how it is in this body, but in legislative bodies in which I have heretofore served it was not in order to refer to what was pending in any committee or what they were doing. I suppose the gentleman verifies the old adage that "every crow thinks its own the whitest," and is therefore opposed to the bill I have reported because he is the father of one which is now before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not oppose the gentleman's bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to say that when the various duties of this House were assigned to the several committees the Committee on Patents it was expected should attend to that part which had been assigned to it. It is our province to take care of our part of this matter so far as it refers to patents, and not that of the Judiciary Committee. The Committee on Patents has ordered me to report this bill to meet not only an existing but a growing evil of a very grave and serious character. It is for this House now, when they have the subject in their possession in a bill reported to them, to say whether they will apply the remedy now or wait for the reporting, if not of a more perfect, at least of a more complicated proposition from another committee. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CONGER. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the gentleman from Virginia strike out the word "section 2" in that bill. He amends an entire section—section 190—of the Revised Statutes and makes two sections of it, so that when printed it will conflict with the numbering of the Revised Statutes as it is at present.

Mr. DOUGLAS. By unanimous consent I hope that it will be done, so as to make the bill only one section.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask whether the gentleman from Virginia will not agree to an amendment to have members of Congress prevented from practicing in the Court of Claims?

Mr. DOUGLAS. This bill has nothing at all to do with members of Congress.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Members of Congress are now prohibited by law from practicing before the Court of Claims.

The bill was passed.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriation for the Military Academy at West Point for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BANNING. I did not intend to say a word upon this bill, nor do I now intend to detain the House with a speech.

The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has told us of the many reductions of expenditures made by the Forty-third Congress, all of which were at the time and now to be commended. The only thing deserving condemnation in regard to some of the reductions made during the first session of the Forty-third Congress is the fact that promised reductions of that session prior to the election were not carried out at the second session of that Congress after the election was over.

Now, Mr. Chairman, times are hard, money scarce, taxation heavy, and it is the duty of this Congress to cut off every unnecessary and extravagant expenditure, to exercise the most rigid economy, saving for our overtaxed people every dollar we properly can, thus relieving them as much as possible from the tax burden now bearing them down, and thereby improving the public credit by establishing a reputation for saving and economy. In doing this, we need not expect much aid and assistance from the other side of this House, because we take from them the luxuries they have enjoyed at the public expense, and expose to the country their extravagance and wicked waste of the public treasure.

I was not surprised, Mr. Chairman, to hear the gentlemen from the republican side of this House charge the reductions of this bill to the "ignorance" of the men who have made them, because an examination of years of republican legislation justifies the conclusion that republican legislators arrogated to themselves all wisdom, and looked upon the people for whom they were legislating as a lot of dullards, and supposed that their shameful waste and fraudulent use of public money would never be exposed. Sir, Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

Success crazed the brain and turned the head of the republican party, until now, in the places of Lincoln, Greeley, Stanton, and Chase, who battled for freedom and against fraud and corruption, we have the present extravagant administration of affairs, with the whisky ring, the Indian ring, the Credit Mobilier, the Pacific mail, the Southern frauds, and the real-estate pool.

As a substitute for the republican doctrine which prevailed at the close of the war, when the soldiers of the South laid down their arms and came over to our camps, when we received them as only soldiers can, sharing with them our rations, our blankets, and our quarters, "with malice toward none and charity for all," we had, a few days ago, a present-day republican effort to retain its fast-departing power by an attempt to open anew the wounds of the late horrible civil war after twelve years of peace, notwithstanding the efforts of all good men, both North and South, to heal them over.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that no member upon this floor will be diverted from the path of duty by this wicked republican maneuvering or the charges of stinginess, meanness, or ignorance made against the passage of this bill. We are dealing with the people's money. Ours is a plain, straight-forward duty, easy to comprehend and understand—the investigation and exposure of all fraud and the reduction of the burdens of the people by cutting off each and every unnecessary expense.

It is urged as a reason why this bill should not pass that it reduces the salaries of the professors at West Point. The bill appropriates for four professors $3,500 each per annum, and for five professors $3,000 each per annum. It is claimed upon the other side of this House that this is not a sufficient amount of pay for these gentlemen. But when we take into consideration the additional fact that each professor is supplied with a furnished house, fuel, light, and medical attendance for himself and family, the pay perhaps is enough. I am advised that it is one-third more than the average pay of the professors in the different colleges throughout the country. To my own knowledge, it is more than double the pay of some professors in certain colleges; and I think there are some gentlemen upon this floor who have been professors in colleges who could vouch for the truth of this statement. I believe the pay of these professors is more than double the average income of the lawyers throughout the United States; double the average income of the physicians throughout the country; and more than three times the average income of the ministers of the Gospel. The president of the Cincinnati Hughes and Woodward high schools receives a salary of $3,500; there are twenty-seven other teachers in these schools, whose average pay is $1,580 per annum. They pay their own house rent, and furnish their own fuel and light. They are liable to be discharged and lose their salary at any time, while the West Point professor holds his position for life, and is retired on 75 per cent. of his pay when he is old or becomes disabled.

Again, it should be taken into consideration that these nine professors do not do all the work at West Point. Reference to the Army Register for 1876 discloses the fact that in addition to these nine professors there are forty-one officers of the Regular Army on duty at the academy, ranging in rank from colonel to second lieutenant, whose aggregate salaries amount to $83,000 a year. And, besides this, there have been on duty during the last year nine officers who have been relieved, and whose aggregate salaries were $16,600, making $99,600, not counting their allowance for fuel, quarters, and forage. Add to this the amount appropriated by this bill for salaries of the professors, $29,000, making an aggregate for salaries alone of $127,000, not including quarters and allowances of professors, teachers, and instructors for teaching three hundred and twelve cadets. This gives a professor for less than each six cadets, and makes an allowance of $407 for tuition alone for each cadet per annum.

Again, it is claimed that the professors are at extra expense at West Point, there being no schools there in which to educate their children. If there is no school at West Point for these officers' children, then they had better do as other people do, raise a fund and establish a school. Their opportunities for educating their children are certainly a thousand times better than those of the officers who serve upon the frontier, where they have neither schools, books, or society.

Again, it is claimed that the reduction in the pay of the cadets is too great. This may be, and it is a subject entitled to the most careful consideration. My own opinion is, that the cadet should be paid only a sufficient amount to defray his necessary expenses. The less money these young gentlemen have the better it will be for them, because it will tend to teach them the inestimable value of the lesson of economy.

The question resolves itself into this: After the cadet is furnished with fuel, light, quarters, tuition, medical attendance, medicine, and rations, is $450 enough to clothe him? Or, adding the price of the ration furnished him to the $450, making $559.50, is that amount sufficient to board and clothe him? His ration is the same as that furnished the soldier in the line, whose commander he is to become and for whose comfort and well-being the management of West Point should teach him to care. If this ration is sufficient for the soldier on duty, is it not sufficient for the cadet at West Point?

It is claimed that this reduction will prevent the sons of poor men from going to West Point. On the contrary, as the cadets are not permitted to receive money from home, it will prevent the sons of rich men from seeking these appointments to procure their education at a great expense to the Government, and resigning as soon as they decently can. Sir, if you will take away all of the cadet's pay and give him only the rations and clothing that the common soldier draws, and give me authority, I will fill the academy with worthy sons of men and women of the city of Cincinnati, who are paying their rent and supporting their families upon salaries of less than $500 per year. This reduction will not drive away the sons of the poor, although its economical requirements may be disagreeable to the sons of the rich.

This question, however, as I said in the beginning, is one deserving careful consideration. These young men should be well fed, comfortably clothed, well cared for, and molded into soldiers, not taught to be mere officers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this bill which I had hoped the Committee on Appropriations at this time at least would not have reported on for action, and that is the reduction of the allowance to officers of the Army on account of length of service. This principle was established at the instance of General Scott, I believe, in 1838, and applies to the soldier as well as to the officer. It has been found to work well. I believe that length of service should increase the allowance of these men. There are lieutenants in the Army who are grandfathers, who can scarcely hope ever to be more than captains. So the only reward they will ever get for long and faithful service will be this longevity allowance. I hope when we come to that part of the bill relating to this matter the Committee on Appropriations will allow it to be stricken out and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for further consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the entire subject of the reducing of salaries is, I can assure the House, a most distasteful one to me. Not at all within the line of my wish is it to embarrass in the least degree anybody, but a sense of duty to the people of the United States prompts me to a rigid performance of what is clearly their wish in this respect, and the committee of which I am chairman I think participate fully with me in all I have just stated.

It is not the desire, nor do I believe is it the effect of the bill, in the least degree to embarrass the efficiency of the Military Academy. If I thought so, I would not here advocate the changes which have been suggested by the committee. There seem to be three distinct points of difference between the gentlemen who spoke on yesterday on the other side of the House and the committee, and I will proceed in somewhat of a business way to examine them. The committee thought that the professors in that institution were receiving, under the circumstances and condition of the Treasury, more salary than we were warranted in allowing them. It is difficult for a layman like myself to follow the intricacies of the law in reference to the payment of the Army. But stripped of any confusion that may attach to the details, I believe that this bill gives to the four senior professors of the academy about $4,600 per annum. I arrive at that in this way: Besides the $3,500 per year of pay which we provide for in the bill, we estimate the additional benefit of having a house, whether furnished or unfurnished, at $800; and then fuel, which is provided, I estimate at $300. The light I understand is paid for by the professors.

Mr. HURLBUT. Light is paid for by every one who uses it except the cadets.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not, in estimating the pay these professors would receive, bring light into the question. The junior professors, five in number, have always had about $500 less than the senior professors, and therefore in the bill we have provided that those professors shall receive $4,100.

Now, sir, there is a matter to which I may here direct the attention of the committee. It is that these gentlemen, for whom I entertain the highest respect, have some advantages which civilian professors in an establishment of that character or in the colleges of learning in this country do not possess. Whenever their usefulness shall cease by exhaustion of nature these gentlemen have the privilege of being retired at three-fourths pay. Therefore I think the proposition, stripped of all its difficulties, is presented to the committee simply in this way: Whether $4,600 per annum is sufficient for the four senior professors and $4,100 for the five junior professors there.

The next point is as to the pay of the cadets. The pay of the cadets up to the year 1867 was $500. Prior to that by various laws it ran down to $16 per month in 1802, with two rations. But for my purpose I will only institute a comparison between the pay of 1867 at $500 and that which we propose. In 1867 there was in an appropriation bill added a ration, which is equivalent to thirty cents per day, and in the aggregate to $108.50 per annum. I take it that the Congress of the United States, in adding that ration, had in view the fact that the expense of maintaining a cadet at the high prices of 1867 warranted that increase.

Now, sir, we were unwilling in a single year to take off from the cadet the entire amount of that ration, which is always, I believe, commuted. Therefore for this coming year we proposed to make half a step, as it were, back to where the pay was in 1867. Subsequently, however, the committee reached the proposition to pay these cadets $45 per month and strike out the ration entirely, which is $540 a year. The next point is, as I want to show the committee, that in fact the cadet has no interest in this matter whether he should receive $500, $540, or whether the pay is left at $608.50. If I am correctly informed—and, if not correct, I hope some one will put me right—the entire amount of this pay goes to the support of the cadet, just as a father would support his children, and none of it ever reaches the pocket of the cadet until the end of the service of four years. Then he receives what has been saved for him for a particular purpose; that is, $2 a month for four years, which makes $96 in all, for the purpose of buying a military suit and sending him into the world well clothed. Now, we believed that under these circumstances, the cadet having no earthly interest in the amount of pay, the difference between the expenses of 1857 and the expenses now in maintaining and supporting the cadet warranted that reduction of $68.50.

And that is the ground on which the committee acted; and I want to say here that there is not the slightest feeling in any respect whatever among any of the members of the committee to interfere in any degree with these young men. I was once a boy myself, and I have a little of young blood left in me yet, and far be it from me at any time, in any way, to embarrass or annoy these young gentlemen who hope to be, and probably will be, of as much service to their country as those have proved to be who have gone before them.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have been informed—in fact, I saw it so stated in a paper coming from the War Department to the effect that during the last four years, out of the pay assigned to these cadets during that time, there was only sufficient saved out of their regular pay to enable the Government properly to equip them with a suit at the time they graduated.

Mr. RANDALL. It may be; I do not know to the contrary. But that is the regulation, that $2 shall be saved each year, and I have just said so.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I understand that. But I now ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether or not to the extent that this reduction is made, about $70 a year, amounting to $240 in the four years, this equipment will not be taken from cadets when they go into the Army?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. The judgment of the committee is that $540 a year is sufficient, with a reduction of $2 per month, to maintain a cadet at West Point for the year next following.

Mr. HURLBUT. The question put by the gentleman from Maryland was whether on the basis proposed by the committee there is sufficient margin left to equip and fit a young man at his graduation.

Mr. RANDALL. Since 1867 the prices of materials and of all that enter into the consumption of a cadet have been enormously reduced. I believe I may say that I lived at the rate of $5,000 a year in 1867, and I believe that to-day I can live at $4,000 and have all the comforts I had then and everything I had then.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is however a matter of fact that no cadet has graduated during the last four years who from the savings has been able to fit himself out for the cavalry service.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not the fault of Congress, but of the management; nor is it within the power of the law to correct that.

Now, the next point which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] pressed upon the House yesterday was that the committee had refused to finish the hospital at West Point. That was the substance of his argument. It is due to the committee to say what governed them in that particular. They estimated that $42,000 would be necessary to complete that building, and while the committee deemed that too much they took this position: there are two members of the Committee on Appropriations who are also members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and we left it to them to examine the plans of the hospital and see what amount is necessary to complete it. We propose in the Committee on Appropriations—and if I know its judgment and determination on any subject I certainly know it upon this—that as to every public building of every description throughout the length and breadth of the land now in course of erection we shall have the judgment, first, of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds as to the amount that can be used to advantage in connection with those public buildings, and then, if possible, the Committee on Appropriations will conform to their judgment, or at least it will be in the main a guide for their rule of action.

I think I have successfully shown that the Committee on Appropriations do not want to leave that hospital unfurnished; and when the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall report a proper appropriation in this connection it will be no doubt inserted, with appropriations for other public buildings, for their consideration, in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would ask the gentleman whether he has ever known an item in relation to a military hospital so committed to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. RANDALL. We did it in the abundance of caution, so that in reference to all public buildings in the country we shall have the advantage of the judgment of that committee and their communications with the several Departments. My experience is almost nothing in connection with the public buildings of the country. I have first come in contact with them at this session.

Now I desire to say another word in reference to another point, and that is as to the number of cadets for which we have estimated. We have estimated for three hundred and ten. That estimate is in print. It is the estimate of the Department, and corresponds with the appropriation of a year ago. We were informed, and I am inclined to think correctly, that an appropriation which will keep three hundred and ten cadets per year will reach the average all the time. I do not know that there is any other subject that has been inquired about, and until I hear some other objection to this bill I will not speak further upon it except when amendments may be offered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HURLBUT. The estimate the gentleman alludes to was made by the Paymaster's Department and is undoubtedly correct, but the expert who made it forgot a law passed at the last session of Congress by which the President of the United States is not only authorized to appoint ten cadets annually, but is also authorized to fill all vacancies that occur among the cadets at large, not only during the last year but in years past. So that in reality he has the right to keep as cadets at large the sons of men in the Army and others of worth and position—forty cadets.

Mr. RANDALL. I can illustrate what I want to say better by a fact than in any other way. To-day the cadet at West Point whom I appointed there may not be there by reason of marks. I understand that other members of Congress are in a like situation. There are two that I know of. And the vacancies cannot, so far as I am informed, be filled until the next examination, six months hence. Therefore the average of three hundred and ten is, in our judgment, quite sufficient, and an appropriation for them reaches the amount necessary to conduct the establishment.

Now, sir, I want to dismiss from the mind of the House and the mind of the people of this country, so far as I am able, the idea that in this particular there has been any purpose whatever to embarrass the administration of this institution. There is nobody here who knows me who will for one instant suppose or say that I would be capable in the least degree of embarrassing that institution which has shed so much honor on our country in connection with the capacity which the soldiers educated there exhibited on both sides of the line during the recent war.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Allow me to suggest an inquiry to the gentleman, whether the pay of cadets at West Point at this time is not larger than that of cadets in Great Britain, France, and Prussia?

Mr. RANDALL. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for directing my attention to that subject. In order to be able to proceed safely and securely we took the trouble to find out, as far as we could, what pay and allowances cadets under similar circumstances received in Prussia, France, and in Great Britain. As far as we could learn the pay in the Polytechnic School in France runs very high, and in the Staff School in France still higher. But the average pay of cadets in France, if I recollect rightly, is about $350 a year. In Prussia the pay is less, not much above $120 per annum, and in some schools it runs down to $55 per annum. We have no very direct means of ascertaining the pay in England, but so far as we could get information from those who had knowledge, we ascertained that the pay was less than $400 per year.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman state what is the difference of pay between the common soldiers in this country and in the three countries to which he has referred?

Mr. RANDALL. I have not that information now at hand.

Mr. HURLBUT. The difference is about one-fifth.

Mr. RANDALL. The purpose of these establishments in all these countries, and the purpose of the government in making appropriations to them, is simply to maintain the cadets, educate them, and clothe them, and at last usher them into the army. In England there was an entirely different system prevailing until a few years ago from that which has always prevailed in this country. Positions in the army in England were obtainable by purchase; but in this country, thank God, a position in the Army is obtained only as a reward for capacity and merit. I have cited these facts merely to show the amount of money necessary to maintain these cadets in these several countries.

Mr. SAMPSON. If the gentleman——

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Did the committee ascertain the cost of living in these several countries, of supporting a cadet?

Mr. RANDALL. I admit that in those countries the cost of living is much less than here, but not to the extent of the disparity between the amount of money appropriated for the support of the cadets.

Mr. SAMPSON. I was about to ask that question myself.

Mr. WHITE. I am not only in favor of the reduction proposed in this bill by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] from whose committee it comes, but at the proper time I propose to move an amendment to it to reduce the number of the cadets themselves. I would like to ask what benefit so many cadets will be to this country? We do not propose to go into another great war, and at the present time we have a great number of these cadets from West Point who are drawing salaries as lieutenants, and who are doing the public service no good whatever, and should be dismissed and thrown upon their own natural resources like other citizens of the country. I am not only in favor of reducing their pay, as proposed by this bill, but also of reducing the number to two hundred and ten instead of three hundred and ten, thus saving $45,000 more to this country every year.

Mr. BANNING. Then how will the gentleman regulate their appointment?

Mr. WHITE. I was just coming to that. The gentleman has well asked the question, how will you regulate their appointment? I propose at the proper time also to introduce a proposition to reduce the number of members of this House to two hundred.

Mr. BANNING. That might be a good thing.

Mr. WHITE. I cannot for myself see why two hundred members here should not represent the people of this country as well as three hundred. I am sure that legislation would be much better done here if there were but two hundred men sitting in close proximity on benches, where so many desks now are, and the rest of the members thrown back to the country. It would be a source of revenue to the country which we do not enjoy at the present time. Gentlemen may hiss—I do not know whether it comes from the galleries or from these benches—but one thing I am sure of: that is, that the country is not satisfied with the course we have pursued here during the last two months. We have been doing too much of nothing. We have been here in a large body, unwieldy, placed at distances so far from each other that we cannot hear what is said, and many might as well be at home writing letters as to do so here, for there is too much of letter-writing and paying no attention to what is being done.

I think this bill is good in its purpose; I hope the purpose will be carried still further, and that the number of cadets will be reduced to two hundred and ten instead of three hundred and ten. I hope that at the proper time the majority of this House will go on with their reductions and cut down the Army. We have no use for an Army, or for but a small one, if any. Gentlemen may say that we need soldiers on the frontier to protect our frontiers from the Indians. Sir, that is not so; I speak from my own observation. I do not believe that it is true that the Army of the country protects our frontier at all. Look at Canada; she has no army to protect her frontier, and she has Indians to control as we have.

It is the fear of power that protects our frontier. Our Army never fails to impress upon the Indians the idea that the more they bother the Army the more guns and ammunition and supplies they get from "Uncle Sam."

I have no set speech on this subject. I simply want to say that I am in favor of retrenchment and reform—reduction of salaries, reduction of the number of cadets, reduction of the number of Congressmen; and I will join with any member, whether on that side of the House or this, to effect such a desirable end.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations to reduce slightly the pay of the cadets seems to be a rather ungracious measure; and for one, as a member of that committee, I am exceedingly anxious that the real fact of the case shall appear; that this, instead of being a reduction, is in truth a large increase in comparison with times corresponding with the period in which this expenditure is to be made.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has briefly referred to the legislation upon this subject. I wish to be a little more specific upon that point. I desire that there shall be no occasion for any opposition to this bill on account of any supposed injustice to these boys who come from our various congressional districts.

Whatever may be our opinions about West Point as a military school and as to the necessity for such a school under a Government like ours, the mere freedom of which inspires a military spirit and a military education to a large extent, yet it seems to be the common sentiment of the country that it is better to perpetuate this institution.

I was glad to hear the remark made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE.] Young gentlemen who come into this Hall and remaining here still remember the feelings and retain the consciousness of the views of their constituents are certain to be very valuable members of this House. The trouble is that often we get into a different atmosphere and grow somewhat forgetful of the drift of public sentiment at home. The gentleman's remark was certainly a sound one, that while it may be wise policy to perpetuate this institution as a nucleus around which our military establishment could gather in the event of war, yet the number of cadets is manifestly too large.

Now about the pay of these cadets—these boys in whom we all have a common interest. Let us see what progress we have made in extravagance in regard to this matter. I find that from 1802 to 1845 the allowance to the cadet was only $16 per month. From 1845 to 1857 it was $30 per month, or $360 per year. From 1857 to 1867, embracing a very extravagant period of our recent history, the pay was $500 per year. Now the proposition is simply to go back to that standard, except that we add $40 per annum to the amount allowed during that period. The allowance we propose is $540, being $40 more than was allowed up to 1867, covering the period of the war, during which living was so expensive.

Mr. BANNING. Were they allowed a ration at that time?

Mr. HOLMAN. They were allowed no ration. When the pay was $16 a month they were allowed two rations, computed at twenty cents per day. We all understand that now the commutation is thirty cents per day. By the act of 1867, (and here is a standing point in the progress of extravagance,) by that act of 1867, leaving the allowance of $500 standing as a salary, we added one ration. Now, I say to gentlemen in all fairness that, had it been proposed even then, when our currency was less valuable than now by 40 or 50 per cent., to add $108.50 to the pay of the cadet, the measure could not have been carried through this House. I speak with confidence on that point. That increase was put as a ration and attracted no attention. Thus the proposition increasing the pay of the cadet to $608.50 passed through this House almost without consideration.

Now, sir, if the intention is to retrench public expenditures it is manifest that it should be done wherever it will not embarrass the proper administration of the Government in any of its Departments. I submit to gentlemen that if up to 1867, covering a period when our money was greatly depreciated in value, $500 was sufficient as pay for one of these cadets, why is not $540 sufficient now? Borne down by the weight of taxation the industries of the country seem to be actually exhausted; the vital forces of our productive pursuits seem to be in a state of suspense. This exhaustion of our industries, as indicating the demand for retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government, should, it seems to me, be an unanswerable reason why we should go as far in the line of reducing expenditures as a proper regard for the administration of public affairs will admit. I can entertain no doubt whatever that the allowance to these young gentlemen of $540 per year is ample, as the allowance of $500 was ample up to the year 1867; for I will say here that up to 1866 there was scarcely any complaint from West Point as to the insufficiency of the appropriation by Congress.

But in 1866, after the war was over, we began that fatal line of policy which has resulted in the demand made everywhere that retrenchment should be the solemn duty of this Congress. In 1866 that increase of expenditure occurred. We remained true to the obligations of economy from 1862 to 1866, and I have gloried in the Roman firmness of that side of the House during the first years of that period in resisting every attempt to aggrandize the expenses of this Government. There were gentlemen on that side of the House, some of whom are now holding positions high in the confidence of the people of the country, who were seriously alarmed at every step taken toward increased expenditure, believing that in such increased expenditure lay the bane and terror of all free government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is impossible to present a case which will occur here—and they will occur during almost every hour of this session—in favor of retrenchment of expenditure by the necessary reduction of salary—indeed, sir, I think no case can occur where the facts so clearly justify the assumption that not only the reduction may be but that it ought to be made.

But let me refer to one further point, Mr. Chairman, and that is in reference to the pay of these professors. Gentlemen will bear in mind that almost all the officers of this institution at West Point are detailed for duty from the Army of the United States, and largely, I presume, from the Engineer Corps of the Army. This began simply as an engineer school, as gentlemen will remember, a school for engineers.

These eight additional professors are detailed from the Army. There are in fact but nine officers connected with this institution—I mean those occupying any considerable position—who can be regarded as civilians, and they are only quasi civilians, as I will show gentlemen presently.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] will perceive that it is a matter of total indifference, therefore, as to the classification whether you say a certain number shall receive the pay of $3,500 per annum and allowance mentioned in the bill, and the others three thousand, because the detail of these to the particular position they shall occupy as professors is a duty devolving upon the Secretary of War. This is a portion of that military establishment almost purely so except as to these nine professors.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HURLBUT. Do I understand the gentleman proposes to delegate to the Secretary of War to say who shall have thirty-five hundred and who shall have $3,000 a year?

Mr. HOLMAN. The duty, I presume, devolves upon the Secretary of War to determine what particular position shall be held by the professors of this institution.

Mr. HURLBUT. They are held by seniority.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that to be the case.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. The statute provides four shall have the rank of colonel and five the rank of lieutenant-colonel. It is already provided for in the law.

Mr. HURLBUT. Then why do you not say so?

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Because there is not the slightest necessity of doing so. The estimates call for pay as the law provides.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] certainly perceives that by the present arrangement four of these civilians who are for the purpose of salary incorporated into the Army, having served for a period not exceeding ten years, are to receive the pay and emoluments of colonels in the Army; while those who have served for a less period, the pay and allowance of a lieutenant-colonel. That furnishes a very convenient classification. They will still be regulated by seniority, unless the Secretary of War shall designate them for particular duties.

But, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will bear in mind that the effect of seniority will regulate the question of salary. The effect of that seniority is not changed in the pending bill, for the four entitled to rank as colonels will receive the higher pay, and the five as lieutenant-colonels the lower pay.

But, sir, the remarkable effect of this reduction to which I wish to call attention is that by the act regulating this institution it is provided:

And said professors are hereby placed on the same footing as regards restrictions on pay and retirement from active service as officers of the Army.

I understand the meaning of that is this: that when these gentlemen have served the requisite period of time, and reached a given period of life, they are entitled to be retired on three months' pay. Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. HURLBUT. It is correct; but what pay are they to be retired on? It is to be determined by their rank.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am perfectly willing that it should remain so. We do not change the rank of those persons who served over ten years. They are to rank as colonels and lieutenant-colonels for the purposes of this institution. Those who have served for a less period are entitled to rank as colonel. On their retirement they receive the three-fourths pay; the one class as colonels, the other as lieutenant-colonels. Is this to be overlooked?

Mr. HURLBUT. Three-fourths of $3,500 or three-fourths of $4,500—the pay under the bill or the Army pay—which?

Mr. HOLMAN. They would evidently retire on their rank, and receive three-fourths of the Army pay, whatever it is. The gentleman from Illinois must see that it is too clear a point to be open to discussion. We do not change the rank at all, we do not touch it. While they remain at that institution they receive the pay we fix. When they retire they come under the provisions of this law and retire with the three-fourths pay of the rank they hold. That is no small matter.

Gentlemen overlook the fact that there are no such salaries in this country as we, out of gratitude perhaps, give to our military officers. I see from a statement laid on our desks that the pay of a colonel is $5,811 per annum, with forage for three horses, and the pay of a lieutenant-colonel $5,070 with forage for two horses. Why, sir, three-fourths of that exceeds the salaries paid to the great body of your professors of the highest attainments in the colleges of this country. You make provision for these gentlemen for life, and munificently; and yet gentlemen talk about the insufficiency of the pay.

Mr. Chairman, I have made some little inquiry not only as to the pay of professors in the leading institutions west of the mountains, but also in the leading institutions east of the mountains, and I say without any hesitation that the provisions of this bill now pending before the committee give the professors of this institution a compensation, independent of the benefit of retirement on handsome salaries, far in excess of the average salaries paid to leading professors in the institutions of learning in this country.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him with a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. THORNBURGH. The gentleman from Indiana has said that these officers who have the rank of colonel can retire and receive three-fourths of their pay as such. Would it not be more for their interest to retire, and would they not receive a better compensation thereby, than by accepting what you propose to give them as professors in this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. The provisions of this bill give them more. They are not entitled to retire whenever they please. That they cannot do. They retire under the law, and they get the full benefits of the law. Up to this time we have proposed no change in that law. Under this bill it will be better for them in a financial point of view, independent of the honor of being connected with such an institution, to remain at their posts as professors.

Mr. O'BRIEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is it possible to consolidate these professorships so as to give the professors a little more work, and to leave the pay as it is?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the number of professorships can be reduced, the branches taught being so entirely different. If there be a larger number of professors than is common in institutions of a purely literary character, yet you cannot reduce the number.

But one fact remains to be considered, and that is one which seems to have excited some feeling. I refer to the longevity pay. I do not think that that principle should be applied to civilians. I must confess to some degree of indignation when I hear it urged in behalf of gentlemen in public employment, receiving very handsome salaries, year by year, and permanently, that the fact that they adhere to a post of high honor should entitle them to increased pay at intervals of five years or any other period of time. Why, sir, these gentlemen all the time receive a larger compensation than is paid at similar institutions under the patronage of citizens of the United States and supported by voluntary contributions. Have Yale and Harvard and Brown, those institutions which have shed so much luster upon the character of our country and done so much good in the advancement of the cause of learning in all its varied fields under private enterprise—have they ever thought proper to bring forward propositions to increase the charges upon their educational facilities by providing that professor-receiving handsome salaries from year to year should, as an induces ment to remain, receive at the end of every period of five years an increase of compensation of 10 per cent.? Certainly that cannot apply to those professors who are assigned to duty from civil life, even if it is proper to apply it to gentlemen from the Army.

And it is a notorious fact that gentlemen in the Army seek the positions at West Point on several grounds. They are the most honorable positions, I presume, in times of peace in the Army of the United States. They are posts of high honor. Is that to count for nothing? The officers fighting your battles with the Indian tribes in the West have but little opportunity for distinction. They are not brought in connection with the social life of this nation to any extent. They are not placing their names and their fame upon the records of their country. But there, in time of peace, every facility is afforded for progress and advancement in learning, high attainments in scholarship, and the honor which flows from these. I think that is not to be overlooked. Then there is the privilege, which the gentleman from New Jersey suggested to me, of being pensioned off for life at full three-fourths pay—a new feature in our system, because but a few years since half pay was deemed ample.

I think, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that there can be nothing in that proposition that longevity should be considered. I do not like to consider it. There might be something in it if the pay was insufficient, but every officer, from the very cadet through all the grades of the Army and Navy, receive compensation far above those in corresponding employments and pursuits in civil life and in the administration of our governments, State or Federal. Why, then, should there be this motive for contention for this longevity when there is already sufficiently strong motive for men to retain these offices in the yearly salary which they receive? I think, sir, that gentlemen connected with this institution of learning should receive a certain fixed and definite salary.

Why should not gentlemen consider another fact? You have assigned to various institutions in the country under your laws professors of military science, for the purpose of teaching the science of war in our literary institutions of the various States. Have not gentlemen seen the demoralizing effect of that? Here is a gentleman receiving a salary of $5,000 or upward as a professor, while gentlemen of equal attainments are receiving salaries of $1,200 or $1,500 a year, and I can call to mind within my own knowledge several instances of that kind. Here is a professorship of the highest branch of learning, and the professor is paid only $1,500 a year by the State or the patrons of the institution, while an officer of the Army, occupying a position which requires less scholarship, if he be a colonel receives $5,700, or if a lieutenant-colonel, a salary of nearly $5,600 per annum. You must consider the discontent and ill-feeling that this creates, and the injustice to men of culture at the inequality on which they are placed. Is it proper, sir, that a college institution under the control of the Government should furnish in its pay and expenditure an example either of extravagance elsewhere in the literary institutions of the country or, on the other hand, create dissatisfaction and discontent among men who should enter into the field of learning with capacity and scholarship? I do not think, sir, that this discrimination should be made. We do not much change it; but, gentlemen, between this institution and the other institutions of learning of the country of high standing there is a vast difference. Sir, if this bill should become a law as it is now it will decrease the inequality which now exists between this institution and other literary institutions of the country. Certainly, gentlemen, under free government, when frugality and simplicity are so much desired, there should not be in any of its features an institution like this, which differs as this does from similar institutions under the immediate auspices of the people themselves. In other words, an institution of learning under the patronage of the Government should harmonize with the spirit and genius of our people.

Let me say simply this in addition: This is the first of a series of bills to be reported by the Committee on Appropriations. I am told and we have been informed on the republican side of the House this morning that gentlemen opposite have come here fully imbued with the spirit of retrenchment and reform which the present condition of the country seems imperatively to require. I am conscious—and it is a gratifying consciousness—that all gentlemen here have come into this House on pledges of retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government. I think I might go further. Judging from the temper of the discussion two years ago all over this country gentlemen upon this floor, whether they come as republicans or democrats, are inspired with the same spirit which is displayed in every town and city of the country. In war times our expenditures rose to such unreasonable proportions that a reduction must be made. If this bill should pass and commend itself to the consideration of this House as a measure of reasonable retrenchment of expenditures which gentlemen believe the public service will justify, it will give every earnest assurance that the work before us will be well accomplished. But do not let us, because this institution happens to be one that appeals to our generous sympathies, because it is an institution in which boys from our different districts are gathered together to engage in that learning which will fit them to take part in one of the most honorable occupations in the world—do not let our sympathies get the mastery of our judgments. If our judgments govern, I believe that the bill will pass substantially as reported by the Committee on Appropriations; and if it pass, the people of the country, now looking to Congress with an earnestness never before known in our history in times of peace, will begin to breathe freely and indulge in hope.

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not occupy five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. Speak as long as you please.

Mr. DANFORD. The hope expressed by the gentleman from Indiana in regard to the disposition of the House in favor of all needed and necessary reform I doubt not will be fully met. The cutting down of the pay of the cadets at West Point, however, is in my judgment a retrenchment uncalled for by any party or any portion of the people of this country.

It may be said that the pay proper and rations allowed to these young men are more than is required by many young men in civil life for their support. It must be remembered, however, that these young gentlemen at West Point are not allowed to choose their own manner of life. They are required to appear upon parade in a uniform prescribed by the regulations. The sons of the poor as well as those of the wealthy must touch elbows upon parade; they must appear in the same companies and move in the same society. In my judgment the pay at present allowed is not more than is sufficient for this purpose.

In traveling through Ohio during the last autumn I happened in a town in a central part of the State. I had pointed out to me one of the humblest homes in the town, and was told that there lived the mother and there had recently died the father of the Lieutenant-General of our Army. I was told of the struggles and poverty of his boyhood. And when I remember that from that humble home, by the beneficence of our Government, there was enabled to come a man around whose name there gathered more of the poetry of the last war than any other name in this country, I believe that we should keep the pay and allowances of these young men at such a point that the children of the humblest and the poorest in the land may come to West Point and be so situated as to feel comfortable and at home.

It is the pride of our Army that it gathers to itself its ornaments from the walks of humble life as well as from those more favorably situated. The Army is an institution of this country, coming from the people, from the humblest and poorest as well as from the wealthiest in the land. Young men who go to West Point as cadets are taken from the poorer as well as from the richer families of the country. For instance, in the district which I have the honor to represent I submitted the appointment of cadet to competitive examination, and I am glad to say a son of one of the poorest men in the district received the appointment. If we cut down this pay, we will make it impossible for those who are poor and have little means to send their sons to this institution of learning.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman whether, if it were practicable for the cadets—and I think they are very generally the sons of men in moderate circumstances—if it were practicable for them up to 1867 to live comfortably at West Point, as we are assured they did, on a salary of $500 a year, is it not reasonably certain that now, when the value of money is largely increased and the expenses of living largely diminished, they can live there comfortably on $540 a year?

Mr. DANFORD. I do not agree with the gentleman that the cost of living at West Point has been diminished within the last seven years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to call the attention of the gentleman to another fact. The distinguished military officer to whom he has referred while at West Point, when money was not so much more valuable than now, received the pay of $24 a month only. This bill proposes to pay cadets $45 per month. Does not my friend see another fact also, that if you make the allowance moderate you inculcate a spirit of economy in that institution, of frugal economy, instead of extravagance, which is not desirable for the sons of poor men.

Mr. DANFORD. I am always glad to hear from my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] It is true the military officer to whom I have referred was a cadet at West Point at a time when the pay of the cadet was but $24 per month. But in my judgment since that time the cost of living there has increased fully 100 per cent. As to the matter of economy of living, I agree with the gentleman that the best class of men we have are those who are required to economize in their youth; we get the best portion of our population from that class. But if you place these young men at West Point, and require them, as I have said, to appear together in the same companies, to move in the same society, that young man who is pinched, and cramped, and required day after day to count his pennies and to calculate the cost of every step he takes, will necessarily be ill at ease in the associations he is compelled to make there. I do not believe that the pay allowed in the last appropriation bill to these cadets is any more than is required by the situation and position they occupy in life.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Allow me to inquire of the gentleman whether under the present law the naval cadets at the academy at Annapolis receive the same amount of compensation which is allowed to the cadets in the Military Academy at West Point? or whether, in point of fact, there is not a discrimination against the naval cadets to the amount of at least $100 per month?

Mr. DANFORD. I have not examined that question and do not know; the gentleman can make the calculation for himself.

Mr. ATKINS. Allow me to inquire of the gentleman whether the cadets at West Point are allowed to handle any money at all? Do not the poor boys and the rich boys stand on the same footing, and are they not uniformed the same?

Mr. DANFORD. Certainly they are; that is just the proposition I am contending for, that our Government shall uniform these young men and put them in such a position that they can feel comfortable. I do not think the people of this country require us to act niggardly toward these young men we are training to take high positions in the service of the Government.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman answer my question? Do the cadets handle any money there?

Mr. DANFORD. I think not; that is they handle none of the money appropriated by the Government for their use. But I presume it is not against the rules of the institution for them to handle their own private funds if they have such.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, it is; that is the very point I want to make—that it is against the rules.

Mr. DANFORD. Very well; it may be against the rules for them to handle any private funds. But the point I make is that we should appropriate a sufficient amount of money to make these young men feel comfortable in the positions they occupy.

One word in relation to the pay of the professors at West Point. The proposition here is to cut down their pay—to cut it down by some arbitrary rule that is to be applied, I understand, by the Committee on Appropriations to all positions under the Government. Now, there is one thing to be remembered. These professors are chosen from a class of men who have the ability undoubtedly if they would give to some pursuit in civil life the same application that they are compelled to give to the duties of their positions at West Point, to acquire a competency in the course of fifteen or twenty years. We have arrived at a period in the history of this country when men possessing the ability of these professors can by a few years' application to business accumulate a competency upon which they can retire—a competency for themselves and their families. While we are looking at this proposition for retrenchment we should keep in view the morale, the character, the standing of the men that we require as educators at West Point. I take it that these gentlemen have a pride in their profession and in the positions they occupy. But take away from them the pride which they feel in their positions, and they can go into civil life and accumulate more money; they can after a struggle of fifteen or twenty years leave to their families a competency, while in the positions they now fill, though they may serve a life-time, they cannot accumulate money.

So it is with the officers of the Army generally. They devote a life-time to their profession; and no matter whether they may be on the frontier encountering the dangers of border warfare, or occupying positions at posts along the Atlantic coast, or serving as professors at West Point, they must inevitably look forward to the time when they will require to be pensioned upon their Government in order that they may live; and if they have families about them, instead of hoping for that competency which in civil life they might earn for their families, they must anticipate the time when they will leave their families without proper provision for their needs.

I believe it bad policy to cut down the pay of these professors, and I especially protest against the idea of cutting down the pay of these young men whom we send from our districts to be educated as officers of our Army.

Mr. BANNING. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If these young men are not permitted to handle any money, how will this bill result more favorably to sons of rich men than to those of poor men?

Mr. DANFORD. I suppose the gentleman is aware that in making up the outfit required by the cadets a considerable amount of money is needed at the outset.

Mr. BANNING. Well, they do not get any of this money from the Government when they go in.

Mr. DANFORD. Their parents furnish them with something, I presume.

Mr. BANNING. I want to ask another question. If this bill cuts down the amount allowed the cadet and he is not permitted to receive money from home, will it not result in favor of the poor boy, who has been raised on habits of economy, rather than in favor of the sons of rich men? Will not the poor boys be better able to stand it?

Mr. DANFORD. I think not.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is, sir, with some reluctance that I propose to add anything to what has already been said in reference to the bill now pending. I feel, as my colleague on the committee [Mr. HOLMAN] has said, that the country is looking for much from this House and from the Government in the way of retrenchment. And, sir, the fact that this side of the House is in power here to-day grows largely out of the idea entertained by the people that a change was necessary in order to bring about retrenchment and reform. There was some disappointment on the part of the people with those who had been administering the Government.

Now, sir, I am willing to recognize the fact that there is a feeling on both sides of the House (I saw some manifestation of it in the last Congress; I expect to see more of it in this) to meet the wishes of the people. It is demanded. We have gone through a most terrific war. How far its consequences are to reach, whether they are to be co-extensive with this generation or not, we cannot tell. There are derangements in the currency and derangements of business of every kind and character in the country. There is one thing that will contribute to remedy this state of things, and that is retrenchment—retrenchment in private expenditure as well as retrenchment in public expenditure; and therefore when we come to consider this or any other bill it becomes our duty to look at it as a business proposition, with regard to the interest of the country, and not inject stump-speeches in the debate here when the people are suffering.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat has had much to say on the subject of the pay of cadets at West Point. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] who spoke first on the other side of this question, made some reference to the fact that there should be no sectional feeling on this question. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am tired of hearing this question brought up. I take it for granted that we are capable of performing our duties without any interference of this kind. For one I do not propose, no matter what may come up, to let my actions be governed by the suspicion that somebody may say I entertain some disloyal motive. I propose to act upon high and proper reasons, such as will commend themselves to high-toned men everywhere.

I apprehend there cannot be, as the gentleman has said, any feeling of that sort on the part of any gentleman in this House. That institution has educated and is educating young men from every section of this land. Not a member on this floor but has an abiding pride in its past history and well-grounded hope for its future success.

What has been the history of this institution as to the pay of cadets? What has been the action of those who have preceded us upon this point? In 1802, as has already been stated, it was $16 a month. It remained at that rate up to 1845, when it was increased to $24, and at the latter rate until 1847, when it was increased to $30. And just here let me say to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] who has alluded to the fact that distinguished military characters on each side during the late war were educated at West Point, that they were educated there when the rate of pay was as I have stated it, and not at the increased figures which the gentleman from Illinois favors. It was so during the time the men who made reputation on either side in the late war were cadets at that Military Academy. Was there any complaint then? If so I have not heard of it.

Sir, the rate of pay from 1857 to 1864 continued to be $30, and up to 1864 there was no change. I take it that there was a gradual increase in the cost of living up to that time. In 1864 it was put at $500 a year; ample for all purposes, so far as we have been informed. In 1867 one ration was added. My colleague on the Committee on Appropriations from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] gives a probable reason, and in my judgment the correct one, why it passed through this House unnoticed at that time. I take it for granted, then in this Hall, as elsewhere throughout the country just after the war, there was a high military spirit and a consequent disposition to extravagance in that direction. Are we not safe in concluding, then, if that amount was sufficient up to 1867 it is sufficient now? Has there not been great reduction in the expense of living in reference to food and clothing as well as to everything else? If that be true, what excuse can we make to the country if we do not make proper reduction? When this House proposes retrenchment and reform in the expenditures of the Government, why should we continue to appropriate at this unnecessarily increased rate?

The gentleman who has just taken his seat proposed, he said, that the sons of poor men among these cadets at West Point should be clothed equally with the sons of the wealthy; that he wanted none of them clothed niggardly. I ask him where is the evidence that any one in this institution has been clothed in a niggardly manner? If he can present any such evidence, and it is satisfactory, I undertake to say there is not a single member of this House who will not meet him in a liberal spirit and provide the remedy. But, sir, mere statement without a particle of proof upon which to base it is not that which should be taken for the guidance of this House in so important a matter. I believe this is a deliberate body, and not that sort of a popular assemblage which is to be harangued and controlled by mere stump speeches. I take it, therefore, from these figures, that we are perfectly safe in returning to what was paid previous to 1867.

Now, let me for a moment come to the matter of the professors at West Point. I think it has been sufficiently shown, and it is in consonance with my information that I receive from all sections, that these professors at the West Point Military Academy receive a pay equal to that of professors in any other institution. If there were no other information, that would satisfy me in reference to this salary. I propose to make the institution equal to the design for which it was created, and therefore I would open up these professorships to men of learning and ability from all quarters. Let it reach out and gather ability wherever it may, and I undertake to say that the result will be to put a better class of men there.

But, sir, what do we find? They not only have this, but when they retire, they retire on three-fourths pay. Where is such a provision as that made in any other institution?

Mr. Chairman, I will not take up the time of the House in any further discussion of this matter. I have alluded to what seemed to be the principal features of the bill. When we come to the five-minute debate the details of the bill will be taken up, and then I may take the opportunity of considering them further. But I do trust that the members of this House, and especially the members on this side of the House, will stand by the Committee on Appropriations in the first movement that has been made toward the reduction of the expenditures of this Government. I hope, sir, this will be done by the representatives of the people everywhere; but, sir, for the honor of the party to which I belong I trust they will stand by the committee in every honest effort of that kind that is made. At all events, no attempt at contumely shall deter me from going on in the work of realizing the expectations of a tax-burdened and distressed people.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. When steps are taken by those who claim to be the economists of the House in the direction of retrenchment I am generally well pleased to hear their arguments and add my vote to theirs to bring about good results in that direction without saying anything, and I am somewhat sorry that some propositions made to us by the Committee on Appropriations at this time cannot receive my sanction, because they go further than can be justified.

I admit, Mr. Chairman, that it is necessary to exercise perpetual vigilance to keep the annual budget of the Government within reason and within bounds. When I vote for an appropriation bill, especially anything outside of the usual line of legislation, I always think where the money is coming from and who pays the taxes of the country. And, sir, thinking as I do on this subject, it gives me a good deal of pain to see those who propose economy—because economists are of no party, any more than spendthrifts are of a party—bring in a proposition to which I cannot give my consent. I have thought how I would feel after having voted to cut down the pittance we allow the boys we send to West Point—whether after that I could look a school-boy in the face or no. And, sir, I find I would be ashamed at beginning the economies of the Forty-fourth Congress with a reduction in that direction.

The arguments presented by the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of the bill have failed to convince me that if this reduction is made there will be anything left at the end of the four years' course to furnish an outfit for the cadets. I admit that if some gentlemen on this floor, for example my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] should go down there and take charge of the larder, the laundry, and the wardrobe, there might be an economy effected. But we are making no provision for careful housekeeping; we are merely cutting off so much from the allowances to those cadets who do not control disbursements for themselves. If West Point is too expensive, let us appoint fewer boys. If it is entirely unnecessary, let us abolish it and let the States provide the education it gives. That, sir, might be urged with some degree of consistency, but to starve the boys that we have sent there is something I cannot agree to. It will result in excluding the sons of the poor and confining the military training to the sons of the wealthy, who can be assisted where the Government refuse.

I have been forcibly reminded through this debate of a gentleman who started to London once to enter into certain financial arrangements with a certain Mr. Fagin, one Noah Claypole, spoken of by Dickens in Oliver Twist. Mr. Fagin suggested to him that he might attack some old ladies, run away with their pocket-books, and get round the corner. He said, "O! is not that a dangerous undertaking? Don't these old ladies sometimes scream and very often scratch?" "Yes," he said, "it was somewhat dangerous; they would do that sometimes." "Well, what else have you to suggest?" said Mr. Claypole. "There is the kinchin lay." "And what is the kinchin lay?" "Why," said he, "when parents send out little boys and girls with sixpences and shillings to buy something, you just take their money from them, throw them into the kennel, and walk off as if nothing had happened but a child got hurt." "Lord! that's just the thing," said Mr. Claypole. And I am afraid that in this bill we have got into the kinchin business, too. We tried to save on committee clerks, but the chairmen screamed and scratched till we abandoned that. Why did not the Committee on Appropriations bring in a bill to cut down our salaries?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Iowa need not give himself any uneasiness on that point. He will have an opportunity soon to vote upon that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. When the Committee on Appropriations proposed retrenchment they proposed to have it all along the line.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope my friend from Indiana will be allowed to make a remark when he feels like it. When a bill is brought in to cut down my salary and yours and that of the gentleman from Indiana, I will support it, and do it heartily. If the theory of our friends on the other side is that we must cut down the salary of every officer of this Government, let us do it, and let each man be responsible for his vote on that question. I find no difficulty, sir, in mustering courage to vote against an appropriation bill that seems to me too large or unnecessary, nor will I find any in voting to cut down my own salary, if the gentlemen think extreme economy requires it to be done. But, sir, I tell them they are demoralizing their own friends, the economists of the House, when they bring in a bill asking us to make an attack upon the boys at West Point while there are so many fields that are ripe for the sickle of retrenchment the reaping of which will purify the service instead of pinching any one, and in which we can engage with good-will, holding up the hands of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the Military Academy bill, and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill be closed in half a minute.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and there were—ayes 70, noes 66.

Mr. RANDALL. Before the vote is announced, I would like to ask unanimous consent that when we take this bill up to-morrow morning it shall be in the House under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks, before the vote on adjournment is announced which adjourns the House, that on to-morrow the House consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HALE. I object. I do not object to closing the general debate, but only to considering the bill in the House. We have been considering it in Committee of the Whole, and the appropriation bills are always considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not desire in the least degree to abridge the power of offering amendments, but only to facilitate the passage of the bill.

Mr. HALE. It is customary to consider such bills in Committee of the Whole.

The result of the vote on the adjournment was then announced; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: Remonstrance of the governor and State officers of Nevada, against the removal of the United States courts from Carson City to Virginia City, Nevada, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of George Crilby and and 1,200 settlers of the Des Moines Valley, Iowa, to be protected in their homes, and that the Government keep good faith with those who have lawfully secured and occupied homes on the public domain, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. ———: The petition of citizens of Grant County, Virginia, for a mail route from Petersburgh to Burlington, Virginia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 28, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ALLUVIAL BASIN OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution received yesterday from the House of Representatives; and it was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed ten thousand copies of the report of the commission of engineers appointed to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation, with the accompanying maps, namely, two thousand copies for the use of the Senate and eight thousand for the use of the House.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 917) to amend section 4898 of the Revised Statutes in relation to patents was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The bill (H. R. No. 1042) fixing the rate of postage on third-class mail matter was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial, in the form of a protest of the governor and State officers of the State of Nevada, against the passage of a bill by Congress removing the United States courts from Carson City to Virginia City as against the true interests of citizens of that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of W. H. Jenifer, late first lieutenant Second Cavalry, United States Army, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, asking the passage of an enabling act for the admission of that Territory into the Union as a State; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of D. M. Butler and 40 others, citizens of Oregon, praying Congress to enact a law fixing the price of land within the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company the same as that of other public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Courtney M. Walker, of Oregon, praying Congress to grant him three hundred and twenty acres of land in that State, on which he now resides, as a recognition of his services in opening up and settling that part of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BOGY presented the memorial of the adjutant-general of the State of Missouri, asking an appropriation for the payment of claims for supplies furnished Union troops during the late war by citizens of the State of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a memorial signed by citizens of the city of Dubuque, Iowa, protesting against any action of Congress with reference to Washington Square, one of the public parks in that city which is at present used and enjoyed as public grounds. Inasmuch as I presented a petition of a similar character some days ago, and had it referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I move that this petition be also referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of 426 citizens of Winnebago County, Wisconsin, asking an appropriation for the speedy completion of the Fox River improvement, and also for the construction of a canal along the bank of the Wisconsin River from Portage City to the Mississippi River, in accordance with the third plan recommended to the Government by Major-General Warren, of the United States Engineer Corps; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of John P. Crosby, executor, and Harriet S. Jaudon, executrix, of the estate of Anna M. Conrey, deceased, praying that the sum of $2,025.08 be refunded to the estate of the decedent, which was taken possession of by the United States authorities at New Orleans during the late war and covered into the Treasury of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Mrs. Margaret Hetzel, praying the passage of a law authorizing the transfer of a certain cause now pending in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, brought by her against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, to the circuit court of the northern district of New York, for adjudication and determination; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island of the Independent Order of Good Templars, signed by the officers, representing fifteen hundred members, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WINDOM presented a memorial of the Clay County Agricultural Society, of Minnesota, requesting an amendment to the tree-culture act of March 13, 1874, applicable to persons who have already made entries, so as to require the party making an entry to plant ten acres in three years, (instead of two, as the act now reads,) ten acres in four years, and twenty acres in five years; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BOOTH presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, in favor of an appropriation for the purpose of constructing a breakwater at the port of San Luis Obispo, in that State, and declaring the harbor at that place to be a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that aid be granted for the construction and completion of the Texas Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. COCKRELL presented additional papers relating to the claim of the heirs of Robert S. Thomas, deceased, for compensation for property destroyed by United States soldiers while in the possession of the United States military forces at Kansas City, Missouri, in 1863; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence, have had the same under consideration and have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I give notice that on Monday next I will endeavor to call this bill to the attention of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the papers relating to the election of James B. Eustis as Senator from the State of Louisiana, beg leave to submit a report, and as it is very short I ask to have it read, printed, and laid upon the table.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the papers relating to the election of J. B. Eustis to a seat in this body by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, beg leave to report that in their opinion there is no vacancy in the office of Senator from the State of Louisiana, P. B. S. Pinchback having been elected in January, 1873, to the term beginning on the 4th of March, 1873. They therefore recommend that the papers relating to Mr. Eustis be laid upon the table.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I take this occasion to say that I dissent entirely from the conclusions of the committee in their report; and perhaps it will not be improper to state now that in my judgment there is a vacancy existing at the present time, and existing at the time of the election of Mr. Eustis; and that his credentials, so far as I have examined them, while they may not be exactly regular in form, have all the requisites necessary to entitle him to a seat in this body. I therefore dissent from the conclusion of the majority of the committee, and at the proper time shall state the grounds of my dissent.

Mr. MERRIMON. As a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I also dissent from the report which has just been presented and read at the Clerk's desk, and for reasons which I have given in the past very fully in detail. As to the credentials of Mr. Eustis, referred to the committee recently, it did not become necessary to pass upon them, as the committee determined that there was no vacancy.

Mr. COOPER. I also, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, beg leave to dissent from the views arrived at by the committee. Of course I believe the question which they report to the Senate was not submitted to the committee upon the credentials now returned, and that the credentials submitted to us ought to have been examined. The report goes alone upon the right of Mr. Pinchback, which was not before us. I therefore dissent from it.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to give notice to the Senate that I will some day next week, say on Wednesday, ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the senatorial question from Louisiana, if there be no objection. I think the question ought to be settled one way or the other. I suggest Wednesday of next week, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that it has been announced that on that day tributes will be paid to the memory of the late Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MORTON. I will then say Thursday.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not say Tuesday?

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I did not altogether hear the notice that the Senator from Indiana has given. It really seems to me that the question which he proposes to consider is one of the very highest privilege, affecting the right to a seat, not only the right of a man to a seat on this floor, but the right of a State to be represented on the floor. I have thought the determination of the question had been postponed already quite too long; and it seems to me we should either fill the vacancy in accordance with the already expressed choice of the State of Louisiana or that we should refuse to allow that choice to take effect and let Louisiana send somebody else here.

Mr. STEVENSON. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to state the day he will call up the case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands on Thursday next.

NATHANIEL G. SMITH.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, being in the Chair,) to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey, praying to be indemnified for the loss of postage-stamps stolen from him, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 358) for the relief of Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There are peculiar circumstances about this case, and I would be pleased if the Senate would pass it at this time. It is to compensate for a loss of stamps. A draft has been made which the Postmaster-General has recalled pending action by Congress.

There being no objection, the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates the sum of $845 to re-imburse Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Flemington,

New Jersey, for stamps stolen from the post-office at that place on the night of November 12, 1873.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is accompanied by a report made by the committee of the last Congress January 28, 1875, which, as it is very brief, will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey, submit the following report:

The petitioner testifies under oath that on the night of the 12th of November, 1873, the post-office at Flemington, Hunterdon County, New Jersey, was entered by burglars, and the safe of said office broken open and robbed of postage-stamps to the amount of $845, and other valuables to a large amount; and that petitioner has been careful and duly diligent in his efforts to protect the property under his care; that the post-office was in a brick building, supposed to be well secured, and that no ordinary precaution on his part could have prevented the robbery.

The fact of the burglary is also testified to by Elmer Smith, assistant postmaster, John Lyman, David Van Fleet, (judge of the court of common pleas,) J. P. Rittenhouse, (sheriff of said county,) and a petition signed by sixty-three of the citizens of the village of Flemington.

It further appears from the affidavit of petitioner that, on the day following the robbery, he notified the Post-Office Department of the fact, and on the 17th of the same month forwarded a detailed statement of the losses to the Department.

The Third Assistant Postmaster-General estimates the probable amount of stamps on hand at the time of the robbery at $1,111.64.

In view of the facts as shown by the papers, your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill for petitioner's relief.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. KERNAN. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee where these postage-stamps were kept. If a postmaster stands in the relation of a common carrier or a bailee charged with bonds or money, then, unless under peculiar circumstances, he is liable for the property stolen from him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will observe that the report states that the stamps were kept in a safe, and in a brick building.

Mr. KERNAN. Did he keep any property of his own there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was other property with this. The Department states that there were eleven hundred and odd dollars of stamps on hand, and the bill re-imburses him for $845 only, the amount the postmaster claims was taken from him.

Mr. KERNAN. Does the report state that he used all the care a prudent man would take of his own property?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report states so, and the facts fortify the statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only state that several cases of a similar character have been reported against in the Senate. Two or three years ago this very class of bills was discussed two or three hours in the Senate, and, the principle having been considered fully at the time, I believe finally the Senate declined to pass the bill which was then pending.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the Post-Office Committee for the last six years, at least while I have been a member of it, has reported sundry bills, all aggregating a very small sum, varying from $50 to $200, favoring relief in all cases like this and embraced within these rules: First, proof of the robbery; second, proof of the same care of the property that an ordinarily prudent man would use in his own case; and third, immediate notice at the time of the robbery and a proper exertion to recover the property. Upon those facts being submitted to the committee they have deemed it wise that the postmaster should be relieved; and the ground we have taken is that he has given his bond for his own official misconduct and he is not to be held as an insurer against burglary or things of that character. That has been the rule governing the committee, and the Senate have confirmed the action of the committee over and over again upon a division and by the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This same bill was passed by the Senate at the last session of Congress and failed on account of want of time to get through the other House.

Mr. KERNAN. Of course I was not in the Senate when any question of this kind came up before; and therefore in raising this question now I am not in the least captious, though the amount involved in the immediate bill before us is small. The committee state that they find this postmaster took the usual care of the property which a man of ordinary prudence would use. I understand the rule of law to be that a bailee or carrier cannot escape responsibility without proving that he used all the care which a very careful man would use in reference to that kind of property. In the State where I live, where negotiable bonds have been left with merchants in New York as collateral security, where they only had that duty imposed upon them and were not employés who give bond and who have compensation for care, where they were kept in a safe in a store and the burglary was perpetrated by the safe being broken open, the safe being an ordinary safe, referees have found and juries have found that leaving that class of property in a store over night was not the care which very careful men exercised in reference to their own property.

I only desire to suggest in reference to this case, which may hereafter be cited as a precedent to control our action, that I would not be in favor of saying by act that a postmaster, a depositary of public money or of bonds capable of passing from hand to hand, is to be discharged from his liability because he did what an ordinary man might do, and doing so left the property in a safe in a store with no watchman and no guards beyond merely the resistance of the store and the safe.

Mr. DAWES. I think the Senator from New York, upon a moment's reflection, will see that the rule which he would apply here works an impossibility in the case of a great majority of the postmasters of the country. The country postmasters can find no more safe place to keep their money and their stamps than a safe in their own office or in the store where in a great majority of cases the country post-office is kept. There is in a great majority of country towns no bank that keeps a safe more secure from burglary than the ordinary safe of a country merchant. If the postmaster is required to take the money out of that safe and take it to his own residence, the Senator from New York must see that in that instance he would be less secure from robbery than if he kept it in an ordinary safe. While it may be true that the rule laid down by the Senator from New York may apply, under certain circumstances and in certain cities, and in certain surroundings of watchmen, of police, of large deposits of valuable securities, and with safe-deposit companies, so that if a postmaster so situated, like the postmaster in the city of New York, should keep this property in a common safe, in his own house, or in an ordinary country store, if such a one could be found in that locality, he would not be considered as keeping his property with such care as a man ordinarily does. I apprehend that what was meant by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] in laying down the principle is, that as a rule he takes as good care of this property as men of care and prudence under like circumstances and in like situation take care of their own property.

Mr. KERNAN. I think it a very important fact whether the committee find (and very likely they can state) that there was no bank in that town or village or no safe-deposit company where these valuables could be kept, and where they usually keep watchmen and such other precautions are taken as are necessary against our modern skillful burglars. I think that a very important fact, for the cases in New York to which I have referred are put upon the ground mainly by the decision that there were banks convenient where with no trouble they could have the property deposited and where the building would be guarded. I would like to have it stated, in that view of the case, whether this postmaster could have kept his stamps in a bank or not.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, we cannot here, of course, have all the evidence that was before the committee; but I notice that the report states that these postage-stamps were stolen with other valuables of a large amount, so that it seems this postmaster was as careful of these stamps as he was of his own valuables to a large amount.

That petitioner has been careful and duly diligent in his efforts to protect the property under his care; that the post-office was in a brick building, supposed to be well secured, and that no ordinary precaution on his part could have prevented the robbery.

That fact being established, I do not know what a postmaster in a country village can do better than to provide a safe and have it in a good brick building, a place where he is willing to trust his own securities, and have all these facts fully proved. In this village there is no safe-deposit company. I think there is a bank, but I do not suppose the bank was any more secure than this place, not having the advantages of watchmen and those precautions which they have in cities. This bill passed the Senate at the last session and failed for want of time to pass the other House.

Mr. DAWES. I never thought the rule was a sound one that where a man took as good care of other people's property as he did of his own that would relieve him of his responsibility, for he is very careless often about his own, grossly careless about his own; and he ought not for that reason to be relieved of responsibility for the care of other people's property. But I happen to be on the committee, and I think this case is free from all suspicion.

I want to suggest to the Senator from New York how poorly his rule would work in a case I have in my own mind in my own district, where a set of burglars came up in the night-time from the city of New York into a country town and went to the post-office and broke open the safe in the post-office, an ordinary safe; and that same set of burglars went to the house of the cashier of the bank and bound him and his whole family, hand and foot, and then proceeded to the only bank in the town, broke open the safe in the bank, and carried off all the valuables in the bank. The only true rule, it seems to me, must be that relief shall be given only where a man takes as good care of this property as wise and prudent men so situated take care of it; not as he takes care of his own, because the most careless of men then would get relief from a liability which is imposed on them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Still the general rule is that men take pretty good care of their own property. There may be exceptions.

Mr. DAWES. I am sorry to say that I do not quite agree with the Senator that the rule is that men take good care of their own property.

Mr. KERNAN. I think Story says in discussing this point that men may be very careless of their own. That will not do; they must do what very careful and prudent men do to excuse themselves, and they must prove that affirmatively when the defense is that the property has been stolen.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 359) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg leave to introduce a bill without previous notice for the establishment of a post-route from Paris, Lamar County, Texas, to Sulphur Springs, by way of Cooper in Delta County in that State; also a route from Bonham, in Fannin County, Texas, by way of Ladonia and Ben Franklin, to Cooper, in Delta County.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 360) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Texas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 361) to provide for the payment of claims for Indian depredations; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 362) prescribing an oath of office; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EATON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 363) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 364) to establish certain mail-routes in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ENGLISH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 365) to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 366) to fix the date of entry into the military service of Colonel and Brevet Major-General Benjamin H. Grierson, United States Army, and to correct his record on the Army Register; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 367) to establish a mint for the coinage of gold and silver at Chicago, in the State of Illinois; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of John P. Thomas, administrator, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1589) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1590) to remedy an error in enrollment.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other puposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. ALLISON to add the following proviso:

Provided, That any issue of said bonds beyond the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby prohibited.

Mr. SARGENT. With the consent of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is entitled to the floor, I desire to say a word. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] meant exactly what I meant yesterday in offering the amendment; but I would like to suggest to him that it does not go far enough.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that, and I have another amendment to offer.

Mr. SARGENT. It may be in the same form as mine. I have one which was originally suggested by the District commissioners, and was adopted by the House committee. With the Senator's leave, I will have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the modifications suggested by the Senator from California.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. SARGENT, as follows:

Provided, That all certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 bonds and those which have not been so converted, and all certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

Mr. SARGENT. The certificates are converted into bonds. If you limit the amount of certificates, you necessarily limit the amount of bonds; but by limiting the amount of bonds you do not limit the amount of certificates. If the Senator will accept that in place of his amendment——

Mr. ALLISON. I desire both. I think that should be added to the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Then let it be considered as pending.

Mr. ALLISON. The bonds should be limited, and the certificates should be limited also.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; let it be considered pending, and we will look into it.

Mr. HAMILTON. I should like to ask the Senator from California if he thinks that will stop the issue of 3.65 bonds?

Mr. SARGENT. I unfortunately cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. HAMILTON. It was impossible to restrict the former government, and they issued largely in excess of the contracts allowed by law; and since that government was abolished and commissioners established in their place here they have gone in excess of $5,000,000 of what was expected by the Senate or by the country when they were established. I want to ask now, as long as the Senate and House of Representatives will recognize 3.65 bonds, if the Senator does not think the District government will go on issuing them? I undertake to say they will not stop under $50,000,000, if you recognize them; and he wants to provide now for all the certificates that have been issued, and all that may be issued hereafter, to be invested in 3.65 bonds.

Mr. President, there must be some limit to this thing——

Mr. SARGENT. I thought the Senator was asking me a question.

Mr. HAMILTON. Very well.

Mr. SARGENT. I feel some delicacy in obtruding on the time of the Senator from Ohio in replying to the general remarks of the Senator from Texas, but I will state that the object of the amendment I present is to cut off the power to issue bonds entirely, and if the Senator will examine it, I think he will find that is the effect of it. I do not agree with him that there has been a violation of the law. I I think there has been simply an ordinary construction of a statute passed by Congress. That statute itself was somewhat loosely drawn, and I should like to say in vindication of myself that when that proposition was brought by the committee before the Senate, I stood up under somewhat adverse influences for some half hour, endeavoring by amendments to make the statute more certain; but the committee thought, and it seemed to be the sentiment of the Senate, that at the late hour of the session we then were it would be improper to make any amendment for fear action might fail in the House of Representatives, and consequently the law fail to pass. That was the principal argument against the propositions which I made at that time. I think if I could have had my way in the matter at that time, or at any rate I then thought, if I could have made the bill more certain and definite, there could not be such a question subsequently as was raised yesterday about the construction of it. Therefore if the original law was loose, I must say I take no responsibility for it; but this amendment which I propose tightens the rivets.

Mr. HAMILTON rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will have an opportunity to reply after a while. I am entitled to the floor, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the remarks of the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] yesterday created a good deal of surprise in the Senate and certainly did in my mind, partly from the position he occupies in regard to this question and partly from the importance of the statement he made to the Senate. The Senator from Iowa was chairman of the special committee that reported the act of June 20, 1874, and was presumed, from his supposed authorship and agency in framing the law, to be familiar with all its provisions. A statement therefore made by him that these District commissioners had exceeded the power conferred on them by the law to a large amount naturally excited surprise and would naturally excite feeling on the part of the commissioners and on the part of the public at large.

It is known that these commissioners have been called here from private life, not residents of this city, men of eminent character who have occupied high positions in the Government; men of such high repute that it would be supposed their acts would carry with them great sanction and great weight. They were called here to discharge a difficult and delicate duty, to take the place of a local government which had given discontent to Congress, so much discontent that Congress proposed to abolish it and confer upon these commissioners all the powers of government over the District of Columbia, the power to close up the affairs of the old government and go on and manage according to law the general affairs of the government of the District of Columbia. They came here with that view. Under these circumstances while they are in the discharge of their duty they are met by the statement made yesterday by the Senator from Iowa who reported to the Senate the law which gives them all the powers they possess; and here in order that I may present the charge made by the Senator from Iowa I will read what he said, from page 13 of this morning's RECORD:

I want to say one word with reference to this issue of 3.65 bonds. I think the commissioners of the District of Columbia totally misapprehended the law under which they were created, and that they have enlarged the debt of this District far beyond the authority given in the act of their creation. They misconstrued the act organizing this commission by legalizing all the contracts of the board of public works or most of them. It was never the intention of the committee who reported that bill to legalize those contracts. On the contrary, it was supposed that the act creating the board of commissioners expressly excluded that idea.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at the act; it is before me; and I do not think with the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] that it is loosely drawn; but it is most carefully drawn, evidently the work of able lawyers, of men who were accustomed to the choice of language, and they have expressed their meaning in such clear and definite form of words that nobody can misunderstand it. Now, what powers are conferred on these commissioners? In the first place, the President of the United States is authorized in the second section of the act to appoint three commissioners who are invested with all the powers heretofore reposed by law in the government of the District of Columbia, and especially they shall have power to use the money appropriated by Congress and the taxation levied by the authority of Congress for "the support of the public schools, fire department, and the police, and to the payment of the debts of said District secured by a pledge of the securities of said District or board of public works as collateral, and also to the payment of debts due to laborers," &c. And then it provides:

But said commission, in the exercise of such power or authority, shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed, at the time of the passage of this act.

This gives them three specific and express powers; first, to execute all contracts and obligations that may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of the District. That is clear and distinct by itself. Second, "to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts." As a matter of course, the power to execute a legal contract authorizes them to designate what contracts are legal. It refers to them a legal question and empowers them to point out and designate the contracts that are existing and binding upon the Government; and their duty is to execute those contracts precisely like the President of the United States is bound to execute the constitutional laws of Congress and no others. The third power is to preserve and protect improvements commenced and not completed.

But, to make this matter clearer, and to limit to some extent and control the powers given to these commissioners, Congress provided for a board of audit, without whose approval no money could be paid by these commissioners, no contract could be sanctioned, and no power exercised which affects public money or private money. This board of audit was composed of the Comptrollers of the Treasury, and is provided for by the sixth section of the act:

That it shall be the duty of the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, who are hereby constituted a board of audit, to examine and audit for settlement all the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia and of the board of public works, hereinafter specified.

And then, after specifying two or three matters about which there is no controversy, it provides:

Fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works.

Here is an express declaration that this board of audit shall not only pass upon and act upon officially all claims growing out of contracts made by the board of public works then existing, but all that may hereafter be made or created, that is, after the passage of the act; and no language of authority could be made more clear and express than the language contained in these two provisions. First, the District commissioners have ample power to execute all the existing legal contracts and legal obligations of the District of Columbia and of the board of public works; and second, the board of audit, who are to supervise and control these commissioners, just as our Auditors and Comptrollers supervise and control the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, are required to audit and allow all legal and valid claims growing out of subsisting contracts made by the board of public works, and all that should arise out of those contracts after that time. Can language be clearer than this? This authority was given in the plain letter of this act; so that I respectfully submit to my honorable friend from Iowa that he is mistaken in regard to the authority conferred upon these commissioners.

The honorable Senator endeavors to make a distinction between the debts of the District of Columbia and the debts of the board of public works. There is no such distinction made by the law. Whether there were any contracts at all made by the old government of the District of Columbia, strictly speaking, I am not aware; but everybody knows that all the public works and all the subsisting contracts about which the difficulty arose were contracts made by the board of public works, and those contracts were the contracts of the District of Columbia, because the board of public works were plainly and clearly authorized by the law to make contracts for public improvements, and they did make those contracts to a wholesale extent.

Sir, that committee was organized to see whether or not they had abused their power to make contracts, and that committee reported that they had abused that power, and we abolished the board of public works, leaving however the legal contracts made by them in pursuance of law valid and subsisting; and this law reported by the honorable gentleman himself came in and ratified these contracts and continued them in force, and actually allowed work to be done under them after its passage and contemplated that the commissioners should go on and complete them.

My honorable friend also in his argument seemed to think that because certain contracts had not commenced to run, or because work had not been commenced under them, or something of that kind, they were not authorized to be completed. He argued that the language of this law was confined in its operation to those contracts that were partially completed. The language of the law applies to all subsisting legal contracts, whether the work was commenced or not, and the commissioners were plainly bound and required to go on and execute these contracts, and the public faith demanded that they should. It would have been wrong, and I do not believe that committee would have reported to the Senate a bill which would have authorized the Government to step in and set aside contracts legally made, under our authority, by our subordinate board of public works. We may punish the men who made those contracts; they may have been improvident or foolish; but when made legally with private citizens, and private rights attached, then the Government of the United States was bound to carry into execution those contracts, however improvident. And, sir, the law so says. The law is imperative. The law requires these men to complete subsisting contracts, and requires the board of audit to allow for all claims that may arise under them, and they have done it.

I will go further. My honorable friend refers to the report of the committee made by him and others as the guide of these commissioners. He says that it was not the intention of the committee to go as far as they have gone. That I may do him no injustice, I will read what he said yesterday:

It was not intended that this board of District commissioners should go on and carry out the numberless contracts that were then floating about this city made by the board of public works. Certainly if Congress had ever anticipated such a construction they would not have authorized the issuance of a large amount of bonds upon this District and pledged the faith of the nation for the payment of the interest and the principal at maturity. As evidence of that I call attention to the report of the committee, made at the time, making an estimate of the amount of money necessary to complete those contracts begun and not completed.

Is it necessary for me to say to the Senate that, while the report of a committee may sometimes throw some light on a doubtful question of law or a doubtful construction of words, yet the report of a committee is never looked at as the authoritative exposition of the law. These commissioners, brought here as strangers from different States, found a law on your statute-book which plainly made it mandatory on them to execute existing contracts. Although the committee reporting that law made a mistake in their estimate of the amount outstanding, or hoped some of these contracts would be set aside, the law, which they framed and reported and which wepassed and which has the sanction of all departments of the Government, declared it to be the imperative duty of the commissioners to execute the existing contracts to their fullest letter and detail, and these contracts were just as much the law of the land as if they were set out in hæc verba in this law, and the board of audit were expressly required to audit and pass upon and issue certificates and bonds for claims arising under contracts made by the board of public works. Sir, to expect these commissioners or to ask these commissioners to go behind these plain and mandatory provisions of law to examine the report made by the committee that reported the law would be a latitude of construction that no court would sanction. The law speaks for itself and is plain and decisive. I myself have not referred to the report of the committee; I have no doubt the honorable Senator states it correctly; but when these commissioners came to see what was to be their duty they looked at the law, and they not only found it written there in plain and simple language that these powers were put upon them under the circumstances I have stated, but they proceeded to the execution of these powers with the utmost caution. What motive had they to do otherwise? What motive had they to violate the law of Congress? None that is conceivable or that has been suggested. They not only consulted the face of the law, which is plain and mandatory, but they consulted the law officers furnished them for their guidance, and as I am told they actually consulted one of the members of that committee whose opinion is authority itself on doubtful constructions of law; but as I do not wish to repeat any language of this kind given to me privately, I shall not do so. I am told they consulted and took the opinion of one of the most distinguished members of that committee when a point arose in the construction of that law which he aided to frame; and on this question of their duty to execute these contracts there cannot be even a doubt, because the language is plain and mandatory.

Now, let us go a little further. What did these commissioners do? Did they violate the law? The honorable Senator says they issued three or four millions of bonds in excess of the authority conferred by law; but it is a sufficient answer that the plain language of the law required them to execute these contracts, making no distinction between classes of the contracts, only requiring them to execute legal contracts. What did they do? They examined the legality of every single contract that was presented to them. There were perhaps one hundred or two hundred contracts—I do not know how many, for I know but very little about this matter except as I get it from others—there were over one hundred different contracts affecting sewers and streets and roads, and all sorts of improvements. They took up these contracts one by one, and decided which was legal and binding; and what else could they do?

The Senator may now come in, finding that these improvements cost large sums of money, and say these contracts were improvident. What had they to do with them? They did not make them. They made no contracts except, as I shall show you hereafter, a modification of existing contracts. They found the contracts the law of the land, made so by your act here. They rejected a large number of them, whole hosts of them. They reported at the last session of Congress that they had rejected contracts which would have involved the government of the District to the amount of $600,000. They took up each contract and decided it by itself. Not only did the law authorize them to recognize written contracts, but the law required them to recognize oral contracts made by the board of public works, and required the board of audit to pass upon oral contracts made by the board of public works. These commissioners took only the existing legal written contracts by which they were bound, and sought to execute those contracts according to their spirit and their letter. It is true the amount involved in these contracts turned out to be larger than anybody supposed. How could they tell? I have here the form of the contracts. Who could tell the amount? That depends on the estimates of engineers and the measurement of engineers. All that the contract undertook to do was to fix the rate per foot or per yard, without seeking to limit the quantity. It was impossible to limit it in advance. Therefore the amounts paid under these contracts were much larger than was expected, but still they were valid and subsisting contracts, and the commissioners were bound to execute them. They gave notice of this difficulty at the last session of Congress—called on all of you, and especially on the committee who reported this law, to repair any defects there might exist in it, and in their report at the last session, which I have before me, they classified these very contracts which it is now complained they executed in four different ways. They go on to say that the cost of completing contracts resumed would be probably so much that the cost of contracts of doubtful obligation on which the order of suspension had not been revoked would be $148,000, and then claims for contracts made under awards, so called, rejected by the commissioners, amounted to $437,133. They go on to tell you that some of these contracts they had to recognize and did recognize, and to state what they supposed it would cost to complete them. It seems, as in the case of all the estimates made in regard to public improvements in this city, that the estimate made by the committee who reported this law was an underestimate by millions of dollars, and these commissioners made the same mistake in underestimating the amount of claims made under these contracts. But how could they tell until the contracts were executed and the work measured what would be paid under them? It was not possible for them to do it.

But why should these commissioners be reproached? Not a single act has been done by them in this respect that has not passed under the review of the board of audit. Not one single dollar was allowed by these commissioners. They had nothing to do in this respect except the simple act of a lawyer in passing on the legality of these contracts which Congress declared that they should execute. All they had to do was to do what a lawyer would do in saying which of the existing contracts were legal and binding. If they failed in this, if they erred in this, their decision was to be reviewed upon every contract and upon every payment; a board of officers of the United States selected by law had to pass upon every contract, upon every paper, upon every dollar, and they paid not one single dollar themselves. These commissioners had no more to do with the payment of this money than the honorable Senator from Iowa. The honorable Senator from Iowa had made it mandatory upon them to execute existing legal contracts. As lawyers they said that certain defined contracts, naming them, were legal, and they ordered them to be executed. They had nothing to do with the payment of money, nothing to do with the amount of the debt.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather not; it interrupts the thread of my argument. The Senator will have plenty of time hereafter. They had nothing whatever to do but to say what contracts were legal and what were not, except to make such modifications as, I will show you presently, they claimed the power to do under the contracts themselves. All the questions they had to deal with were legal questions, such as the Secretary of the Treasury decides every day, such as the Supreme Court decides, such as we decide; and all the power there was in this matter which could control or affect the amount of the public debt or the issuing of these bonds was done by the board of audit, the First Comptroller and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, whose signatures and whose official action alone could allow a single dollar of money to be paid from the Treasury.

I have here, furnished me by these commissioners, one of the forms of certificates. They had nothing to do even with the issuing of the certificate. It was not a part of their business or made a part of their business; but by the very language of the law which created them that was made the business of the Comptrollers.

I have here also the form of the bond, with the issue or the amount of which they had nothing to do whatever. The very moment they passed on the validity of a contract, or regulated the terms of a contract, it passed beyond their jurisdiction. The amount, the measuring, the auditing, the paying, was a matter with which they had no more to do than we have. We made the law; they executed the law so far as to point out what contracts were legal; and our authority, our mandatory law, created a board which decided upon the amount that should be paid to every claimant. Even the engineer was an officer of the United States Army, detailed by the President, over whose measurement they had no control whatever.

I know, sir, that my honorable friend from Iowa, who is as just a man as ever lived, did not intend to do injustice to these commissioners; but he must remember that when men like them are called here to fulfill an important duty they are naturally sensitive in regard to anything which involves a charge of undue exercise of power. I have inquired to see what these gentlemen have done that might raise a question about the extent of their powers, and that compels me to examine the contracts that they found subsisting. I have in my possession the form of one of these contracts, not made by them but contracts subsisting and which this law sanctioned and required them to execute. Now I call the attention of Senators who wish to treat this matter fairly—because there could be no motive in the world to do injustice to these gentlemen—to listen to the terms of this contract. This contract is their law, made so by you. They cannot say whether the contract is improvident or not; all they can do is to execute the law; and if they had failed to do that, you would properly arraign them for assuming to exercise powers not conferred on them. Among other provisions contained in this contract then subsisting was this, called the ninth:

It is further agreed that if at any time during the period of —— years—

Said by the engineer to be filled up with one or three years—

from the completion of the work to be done under this contract, any part or parts thereof shall become defective from imperfect or improper material or construction, and in the opinion of the said party of the first part require repair, said party of the second part will on being notified thereof immediately commence and complete the same to the satisfaction of the party of the first part, and in case of failure or neglect of the said party of the second part so to do the same shall be done under the directions and orders of the party of the first part at the cost and expense of the party of the second part.

What does all this legal phraseology mean? It means that if these contractors shall neglect to perform their contract properly, or if the work that is done requires repair within a certain period of time, the District government shall notify them of this requirement, and if the contractors fail to make the proper repairs then the District government is authorized, at the expense of the contractors, to go in and do it. There is a plain and ordinary provision, and that continued during the time within which these parties guaranteed to keep these roads and improvements in repair.

I am told that some cases have arisen where the work was most improvidently done, where not only the work needed repair, but absolutely within the time limited became almost utterly worthless. That was the case in regard to several of the important thoroughfares of the city. Then the question came up before the commissioners, "What shall we do?" "Here is a provision that authorizes us to go in and complete that work and do what these contractors did not do." They did exactly what this stipulation required them to do. They gave notice to the contractors that they must repair the work, they must put it in good order according to the terms of their contract in every case, and when the contractors failed they at their discretion did go on and have the work done. A question arose in the execution of this authority conferred by the contracts made a part of the law, as to the extent to which they might carry the repair. Should they make the repairs in every case of the same material that was required by existing contract between the parties? And here there was a fair ground for difference of opinion. They claimed that they had the right to repair the road and put it in as good condition as the contractors had stipulated it should be put in, and in one case they took all the materials that were worth anything on a particular line of road and used them to repair that road, and then replaced the part that was necessarily torn up in this operation by material of another kind. Why? Upon what ground was this done? On the ground that experience had already shown that the material they adopted to repair this street was far better than the original material, and that in that way the work could be done with less cost. And if the contractors can be made to pay for the repairs that were done it will cost them less under the plan adopted by the commissioners for repairing with permanent material than it would have done to repair with material which had proved to be defective and utterly worthless. There is a case that was acted on by them, and where it seems to me it was proper for them to require the repairs to be made of different material from that which was required by the contract. As to whether they had that power was a question as to which an honest difference of opinion might fairly lead men to decide one way or another. It made no difference in the cost; but if they had restored these pavements in every case with wood, as they had plainly and palpably a right to do, it would have cost the contractors and cost the District government more than the plan they adopted, which secured to the city practical and useful results.

As a matter of course I do not know the various acts done by these District commissioners, but there was a class of improvements that it seems from the report they did do, about which there can be no controversy. The third clause of the second section of the act which I read to you shows that the District commissioners were plainly authorized to execute new work where it was necessary to protect other work done under existing contracts. But I will read that clause again, as I see that my friend from Iowa seems to have some doubt about it, to show that the power is clearly conferred by the language of the law:

And to the protection and preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act.

This is an independent power which authorized them to do necessary work in order to protect and preserve improvements already made. Take, for instance, the case of a sewer where some expenses had been incurred, where by the terms of the contract the work under it extended only to or commenced in such measures as to be practically useless and of no value or that might be in danger from destruction or loss from its unfinished condition. In such cases, under this authority conferred by the statute, they felt it their duty to continue and complete the sewers to a safe termination or to make such connections at their heading and at their end as would complete the work. They exercised that power, and I think it is plainly and fairly given to them by this law.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have said all I need say. All I wished to do was to show that these gentlemen, in the exercise of the large powers conferred upon them in an extraordinary emergency, when Congress stepped in to overthrow the existing District government, have exercised their powers at least without usurpation; that they have not done what they had not a right to do by a reasonable and fair construction, and that, if questions of doubt have arisen in the execution of their duties, they have decided them fairly and to promote the public good; and that is all that can be said of any public officer. You imposed upon them this duty; you required them to enforce these contracts; and, in the execution of these contracts, they have in every case, as they claim, decided not only in accordance with the contracts, but so as to promote the public good.

Another class of cases has arisen about which no complaints have been made. I have been told, and therefore I feel bound to say to you, that in certain cases where work was required to be done under contract and these commissioners thought that the work ought not to be done, that it was for the public good and for the interest of the District that other work should be done instead, they have in such cases compounded and arranged with the contractors to do an equal amount of work on some other street. For instance, where certain work was required to be done on certain streets, and a valid subsisting contract required that work to be completed, and the contractor had a right to go on and complete the work, they have negotiated with him and sought, and, in some cases, availed themselves of, his consent to change the work to be done under his contract to work of a similar character in some place where they thought it was more necessary. Everybody can see that that would be the exercise of a wise discretion, a reasonable power to be exercised by negotiation with the contractor to promote the public interest. And in no case, so far as I have heard, has any complaint been made of the exercise of that power.

Mr. President, I think the bill before the Senate itself is exceptional. The extraordinary powers conferred by this law have been executed, and all of this law ought to be repealed except that which simply continues the skeleton of this District government. That is my conviction. The act reported by the Senator from Iowa was an act to meet an emergency. The creation of this board of audit was an extraordinary thing, and I think ought to be repealed. I shall, therefore, be very willing to cut the thing up by the roots by repealing all power in the board of audit or anybody else to issue any Government securities or any securities whatever that shall bind the Government of the United States. We have got to execute and complete our contracts; we have got to do what we have agreed to do; we cannot stop short of that. We have made a bad bargain. We must not whine and plead the baby act. We have got to stand up and face it. But, sir, if we have now, as these commissioners report to us, executed substantially all the contracts outstanding, and the $15,000,000 proposed will cover them all, then we ought not only to limit the amount to $15,000,000, but we ought to repeal the board of audit, which alone can issue any more, and that power ought to be exercised; and the commissioners, strange to say, although it is thought they are seeking to exercise undue powers, have recommended us in their last report this very thing, which will meet the objection made by the Senator from Texas and stop forever the contraction of this debt.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am doubtful about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is always doubtful. Now, another word in regard to the character of these bonds. These bonds are issued by the United States; every officer who signs them is an officer of the United States; the claims for which they are issued are audited by officers of the United States; they are created under the law of the United States, and they are issued with this plainly printed on the face of every one of them:

The faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

Here is the obligation on behalf of the United States to pay the interest of these bonds and to establish a sinking fund to pay the principal, or, in case they do not do it, to require their agent, their servant, their creature to do it. It so happens that in this District of Columbia there is no power whatever of any nature or character that cannot be exercised by the Congress of the United States. Here at least we have exclusive jurisdiction; and here is the guarantee of the United States that the principal and interest of these bonds shall be fully and promptly paid, either out of the Treasury of the United States or by taxes levied by us upon the property of this District. Well, sir, though not in name a Government bond, it is in fact a Government bond; and the honorable gentlemen who framed this law, who brought it to us, upon whose recommendation we passed it, must have known at the time they stipulated that the public faith was to be pledged for the payment of this interest and principal, or for the collection of taxes to pay it, that it would stand precisely like every other bond of the United States that the United States agreed to pay or agreed to levy taxes to pay, except that in this case the taxes may be levied on the District of Columbia, and in the other case they must be levied upon the whole people of the United States.

Under these circumstances I think we ought to place these bonds upon the exact position that the law designed, and that the appropriation made for the payment of the interest ought to be made directly by the Government of the United States, and then whatever part it is thought ought to be levied upon the people of this District should be levied upon them by taxation and go into the general Treasury to swell the body of taxes, and thus the people of the District would pay their portion of this debt like the people of the United States, and would pay their portion of taxes. But, so far as the bond-holder or the man who has purchased is concerned, he holds the security of the United States, and we can no more violate, or impair, or impede, or delay the full performance of this obligation than we can impair, impede, or delay the obligation to pay the 5.20 bonds of the United States. That is the view I take of this law. Therefore, I think that the precedent set at the last session should have been continued and the appropriation made directly from the Treasury. The result of the passage of the bill as it now stands, although I am not opposed to it, because there is no time to correct it, is simply to create a deficiency which will have to be met, and have to be paid before this session closes. We are now taking money that is collected from the people of this District, and set apart for schools and for police and for all the various purposes of local government, to pay an obligation which we have contracted to pay or to see paid. But, as this is rather a matter of form than of substance, I shall not raise any question on the passage of this bill, because I think that, before another appropriation is made, the question of the character and nature of these bonds ought to be settled by act of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I only desire to say a word or two in reply to what has been said by the Senator from Ohio. I agree with him thoroughly as to the character of these 3.65 bonds; and it is because I agree with him that I object to so large an increase of these bonds, unless the authority to increase them is clear. In the act of June 20, 1874, the Government did intend to guarantee to the holders of these bonds the principal and the interest by appropriations or by taxes levied upon the property of the District of Columbia. Therefore, these bonds are of such a character that it does concern the Government of the United States as to the amount of them that may be issued.

Now, the argument of the Senator from Ohio is that the District commissioners were authorized by law, and not only authorized by law but bound to execute the contracts made with the board of public works. I differ with him in regard to the construction of the act. The clause which he read is a clause of limitation. It limits the power of this board of commissioners. It says they shall not do certain things. And when this limitation comes to the question of the streets and the alleys of the District of Columbia, the law gives them power only to protect and preserve improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of the act. I agree that the clause immediately preceding may be construed to authorize these commissioners to execute the legal contracts of the board of public works, although I assert it was not so intended at the time. There were originally two distinct corporations then existing here, as I stated yesterday, the corporation called the board of public works, which was independent of the District of Columbia, and then the corporation proper called the government of the District of Columbia. The board of public works had power and control over the streets of the District, and the intention of this limitation was to confine the work upon the streets to such improvements as had already been begun and as were necessary to protect the improvements already made.

It is said by the Senator from Ohio that these commissioners, coming as they did from distant States and required to execute this law, had no authority to look behind the law and see what the Congress of the United States meant by the passage of it. Sir, I make no imputation on this board of commissioners; I regard them as highly as the Senator from Ohio does; I do not know, nor do I believe, that they have committed any intentional wrong here; but I call attention to the fact that the report of the joint committee to investigate the affairs of the District of Columbia contained an estimate for the completion of work on these streets and alleys which had already been commenced, amounting to $1,325,911. The joint committee of investigation called upon the chairman of the board of public works, and asked him to furnish that committee with a list of contracts that should be completed in order to "preserve and protect," in the language of the statute, the work already begun. Governor Shepherd, who was chairman of the board of public works, sent to the committee an estimate of the amount of money necessary to be expended in order to preserve and protect this property. That estimate is found on page 465 in the governor's answer, and there he gave us a specific list of contracts that in his judgment ought to be enforced by this new board when created, or by such successors of the board of public works as might be created. He gives not only the numbers of these contracts, but he gives the aggregate amount necessary to their completion, making the exact total which the joint committee reported ought to be completed. A little examination of this report and of the governor's answer would have shown the contracts that ought to be completed by these commissioners.

It is said they were not required to go back to these reports. I do not say they were so required. I only say that if they had taken the slightest trouble they could easily have seen what at least the committee who reported this law meant when they required these commissioners to preserve and protect the work already begun and not completed.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. If the committee were so well satisfied that that was the amount needed to complete these improvements, I ask why they did not provide in the law in four or five lines that the amount expended should not exceed the sum of $1,325,911.62, and require them to set aside all other contracts? That would have ended the matter. It seems that the governor being required to state what contracts were outstanding and that in his judgment ought to be completed, stated them and estimated what it would cost to complete them. You did not confine this board by the law to that list or that amount. You simply said to them "Exercise your judgment what contracts ought to be completed, and we give you an engineer to supervise them and a board of audit to pass on the accounts."

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from California might with much more propriety ask me why it was that we did not limit the issue of these 3.65 bonds. That was proposed, but we could not limit them to the exact dollar, and because we expected that these commissioners would in the exercise of their judgment only issue so many 3.65 bonds as might be necessary to carry out the letter and spirit of this act, we proposed the law as it is. Nor could we limit the exact sum which would be required to complete the contracts which it was necessary to complete. For instance, the whole system of sewerage at the time this law was enacted was in an incomplete state. Everybody agreed that it was necessary to complete the sewers, but no one could tell whether it would cost $1,325,000 or $1,325,500 to do this. Therefore the committee and those who framed this law left to the discretion of these commissioners the amount of money they should expend; and that is why I object to the action of the commissioners. I do say that there were intimations enough to them to indicate that it was the sense of Congress that extraordinary expenditures should not be made in this District in view of the expenditures that had already been made; and I must confess that I am amazed by the statement made by the Senator from Ohio with reference to the powers of the commissioners. If I understand him correctly, it is within their province and jurisdiction, unless restrained by law, to repair all the worthless streets of the District of Columbia, and for such repair to issue 3.65 bonds binding the United States to the payment of the interest and principal. He says they have already done this, and if they have done it in one street or two streets or five streets, as I understand they have, why can they not repair every street in the District of Columbia according to their own taste, and issue for these improvements and these extensions the 3.65 bonds provided for in this act?

These are the things that I complain of, and I think that we have a right to complain of these things, especially when the fact is admitted by every Senator on this floor that the United States is finally bound to see that these bonds are paid. If there was no such obligation on the part of the United States, then we might allow these men to ornament the District in such manner as they chose; but it seems to me that when they do make these improvements the owners of property ought to know that they will be required to pay at least a portion of the expenses of them, and that they shall not be paid in the securities provided for by the act of June 20, 1874, which only intended to cover the floating debts of this District and such improvements as were actually necessary. I will not say that these District commissioners did not fairly have a right to construe this law as they have construed it. I only say that when they reported to us a year ago that there were only two millions of these bonds issued and four millions more of certificates, in round numbers, it does strike me as an extravagant use of their power to now report to us that there are fourteen millions of these bonds issued; and it was because of this large increase in a single year that I instituted myself the inquiry in reference to the amount of money expended this year, and found it to be over $4,000,000.

It does seem to me that this is not the exercise of such frugality and economy as it was intended these commissioners should use when the act of June 20, 1874, was passed. That is all I meant to say. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that we are bound to provide for the principal and the interest of these bonds, and therefore I am ready to do so; but I do not agree with him in his statement that we ought to now appropriate money from the Treasury for that purpose. We appropriated money last year for this District which was intended to include the February interest upon these bonds as much as it was intended to include any other expense in the District. We made specific appropriations last year for the District of Columbia and they covered all necessary expenditures of the District of Columbia, including, of course, the interest upon every obligation.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will turn to the document, I think he will find that in the estimates on which the appropriation was based this interest was not included. I am so told; I have not examined the document myself.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; but we made an appropriation of a round sum to the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. But what is the argument? As Congress had two or three times made special appropriations for this interest, the commissioners did not include the amount in their estimate for the current fiscal year, and therefore it was not appropriated by Congress. That is what I am informed, and I think that is the fact. They, supposing the plan adopted by Congress was to appropriate it directly, did not include it in their estimate for general purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be true. I only state that they ought to do it; and I believe they would have a right, even without this act, to pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds when it matures on the 1st of February; but I am willing to give them the authority in order that these bonds may not go to protest, as I believe the good faith of the nation is bound to protect them and see that the interest and principal are paid.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me a moment, I should like to recall to his mind, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, the fact that last year we made a round appropriation for the District and also the interest for the year, and for the present year we made a round appropriation for the District, and an appropriation for interest for one-half the year; that is to say, for the August interest. As the bill passed the Senate it provided for the interest in a separate item for the whole year, but the House non-concurred, and in committee of conference, by agreement, it was agreed to pay the interest of the first half of the year, leaving the balance for consideration at this session. So if he will turn to the statutes he will find that there is a specific item for the interest for one-half the year.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be true; the Senator may be right; but, if that is true, then so much the greater reason why this half year's interest should be paid out of the taxation of the District of Columbia, because we certainly do not propose to pay out of the Treasury of the United States more than one-half of this interest upon the 3.65 bonds.

Mr. SARGENT. We certainly did the year before; and it is only a question of increasing the general amount of appropriation. If this interest now is paid, under this bill, out of the appropriations for the District, it will leave a deficiency in the one-half which the United States bears of the expenses of the District.

Mr. ALLISON. We made the appropriation for last year because there was no District money in the Treasury that could be used for the purpose of paying this interest; so that we were compelled to make it. However, that is a matter of no moment at the present time.

I have only called attention to what I believe to be the true construction of the original act with reference to the control of these commissioners over the streets and alleys of this District. If the construction put upon the original act by the Senator from Ohio be the true one, then these commissioners in the exercise of a discretion, and I believe as wise a discretion as they have exercised, could involve the United States in an indebtedness amounting to very many millions of dollars, because if these improvements are to continue in the same manner and by the same method that they have hitherto been conducted they will cost very many millions of dollars in this District.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, as I was a member of that committee of investigation into the late government of the District of Columbia which framed and reported this law, and as a great deal has been said about the law which we recommended and which finally passed both Houses, I wish to be heard in regard to it.

I do not rise for the purpose of reviewing the action of the present commissioners of the District of Columbia, for a very simple reason: I have not had time to look into their recent report. I glanced over their report last year, but that has passed out of my memory; and I have not looked into the report of this year for want of time, although the subject is not wanting in interest to me. I am not, therefore, authorized to criticise their conduct, nor am I disposed ever to criticise the conduct of any man unless I have that knowledge which in my opinion justifies criticism. But I do wish to say something upon the subject of this law, which I fear is to some extent misapprehended and perhaps has been misapprehended in its execution.

The second section of the act of June 20, 1874, confers upon the board of commissioners certain powers. These powers are in the first place stated generally.

The section is:

That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons—who shall, until otherwise provided by law, exercise all the power and authority now lawfully vested in the governor or board of public works of said District, except as hereinafter limited.

Now come their powers—

That is the first grant of power to these commissioners. They are invested with the powers that existed under the old Government, in the governor of the District, and in the board of public works, "except as hereinafter," in this act, "limited." The power of the government under the former law in respect to the making of contracts for improvements was, I may say in general words, nothing at all more than a mere ministerial power. In fact, it may be said to have been nothing, for that power rested with the board of public works; but this act having vested in three commissioners the power of the board of public works we have to look to the previous legislation to find what that power was; and looking at that we find it was a very extensive power. The old government was one of the most complicated machines that ever I have investigated. It consisted of a governor and a Legislature; then of a board of public works; then of a board of health; and each one of these departments, the legislative department, the board of public works, and the board of health, assumed almost independent functions in the discharge of what they supposed to be their duties. The board of health made ordinances which it sought to enforce through the courts as if it were a Legislature; the board of public works made contracts which it was not authorized by law to make; and the Legislature failed to exercise that supervision over the board of public works which it was its duty to exercise. The board of public works had very large powers in the making of improvements, but there was a limit upon their powers. They were not authorized of their own mere motion to make any improvements they saw fit to make, but they were bound to submit to the legislative body a plan of improvement, and until that plan received the sanction of the legislative body the board of public works had no power to make the improvements. It was the intention of the law, therefore, that the Legislative Assembly, consisting of a council and house of delegates, should determine, at least in a general way, what improvements should be made, and the duty of executing their will was devolved upon the board of public works. The Legislature having determined what public works should be made, and provided the means for making them, then the duty devolved upon the board of public works to let the contracts, and to execute the work or see to its execution.

From this statement it will be seen that the authority of the board of public works was not an original, independent, substantive authority to make any improvements that it saw fit; and, consequently, when their powers were devolved upon the present commissioners it was no substantive grant to the present commissioners to embark in any system of improvement they saw fit to inaugurate. Why, then, it may be asked, were the powers of the board of public works conferred on these commissioners at all? As the board of public works, according to the old law, were subject to the General Assembly, and as that law contemplated that all schemes for improvements should first have the approval of the General Assembly of the District, and as the General Assembly was abolished by this law, it may be asked, why were the powers of the board of public works vested in these commissioners? It is found in another clause; and that is that they shall—

Exercise all the power and authority now lawfully vested in the governor or board of public works of said District, except as hereinafter limited.

"All the power now lawfully vested in the governor or board of public works." Certain powers had been lawfully vested in the board of public works, both by the organic act and by the several acts of the General Assembly of the District; and those powers in respect to many contracts were unexecuted in regard to improvements which had been commenced and which were incomplete. It was necessary to provide some functionary or functionaries who could carry into execution those works which had been undertaken by the previous board of public works but were yet incomplete; and there was no functionary upon whom to confer that power but those three commissioners, for we made them the whole governors of the District for the time being.

So it will be seen that this provision was perfectly wise. Care was taken that they should have such powers as were lawfully vested in the board of public works, and thus where the Legislative Assembly had authorized improvements to be made and they had been undertaken by the board of public works and were in process of execution, as it was absolutely necessary that some public authority should see to their completion, as the contracts were in existence and were being executed by the contractors, and there must be some public functionary to see that they were executed according to the contract and to provide payment for them, this provision was put in, and wisely and properly, nay, necessarily put in, that the commissioners should have such powers as were lawfully vested in the board of public works. But, I repeat, that gives them no independent power to inaugurate great schemes of improvement themselves, for the board of public works did not possess that power. The board of public works was subordinate to the Legislative Assembly, and, as I said before, no great schemes of internal improvement could be made in the District without first having the sanction of the Legislative Assembly.

Now, coming to the further powers conferred on these commissioners, the act says:

And shall be subject to all the restrictions and limitations now imposed by law on said governor or board; and shall have power to apply the taxes or other revenues of said District to the payment of the current expenses thereof, to the support of the public schools, the fire department, and the police, and to the payment of the debts of said District, secured by a pledge of the securities of said District or board of public works as collateral, and also to the payment of debts to laborers and the employés of the District and board of public works, and for that purpose shall take possession, &c.

These were all powers that were necessary to be conferred on these commissioners, and it is a mistake to suppose that in this section there is the slightest reference to the issuance of 3.65 bonds, or that this section, or anything in this section, authorized the use of 3.65 bonds in the execution of any of the powers conferred by it. The use of the 3.65 bonds is provided for in another section entirely, and the taxes and revenues of the District spoken of in this section do not include any 3.65 bonds whatsoever. The 3.65 bonds are not revenues of the District; they are debts of the District. There is no provision for their sale and for paying the proceeds into the treasury of the District so as to make their proceeds a part of the revenues of the District. They are in no sense whatsoever revenues of the District of Columbia, but, on the contrary, are the obligations and debts of the District of Columbia; so that there is no power whatsoever conferred by the second section to use a 3.65 bond for any of the purposes mentioned in the section. It was only a power to use the taxes and revenues of the District. What are these revenues? Various revenues. There is authority given to borrow money, so that they could get revenue by borrowing money. The revenues in this District, in addition to its taxes, consist of various charges for licenses and the like, and also of fines and penalties imposed under the laws of the District, which go into the treasury. These are the revenues, other than taxes of the District, which these commissioners are authorized to use for the purposes here mentioned, and to pay the current expenses of the District, to support the common schools and the fire and police departments, and to pay certain debts that are here specified, the debts due to laborers, and the like.

Now, Mr. President, having shown that the power to issue 3.65 bonds does not apply at all to anything contained in the second section of the act, that it is not a power to enable the commissioners to execute any of the general authority conferred by the second section of the act, we come to the sixth section of the act, which provides for the issuing of 3.65 bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to interrupt the Senator at this point.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to call his attention, before he leaves the second section, to this clause:

And to the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed, at the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. THURMAN. What section does the Senator read from?

Mr. ALLISON. The second section, just before the clause referring to the collection of taxes.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand. That is among the limitations.

But said commission, in the exercise of such power or authority—

That is this power or authority to apply the taxes and other revenues of the District to this purpose. We did not even give them that unlimited power. That is a limitation upon the power which was exercised before by the board of public works and which we have authorized these commissioners to exercise, and we put the limitation upon them that they—shall make no contract, nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted by the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed, at the time of the passage of this act.

That is a limitation of their power.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if he limits their power to the amount of the revenues and taxes to carry out existing contracts where works have been commenced?

Mr. THURMAN. No; because the 3.65 bonds come in afterward, in the sixth section. They are intended to be entirely distinct. This limitation is put in on their power even in regard to taxes and revenue. They shall not use taxes and revenue to pay for new contracts, and while we were putting in the limitation upon taxes and their use of the taxes and the revenue we used language broad enough of course to include the 3.65 bonds subsequently provided for in the act; but that is no substantive power at all. That power was already granted, a power much larger than that. All the powers lawfully invested in the board of public works would have been much larger than that, and would have authorized new contracts, but we limited their new contracts to cases where it was necessary to complete contracts that were in process of execution or to preserve improvements existing.

Mr. MORTON. I understand the Senator does not limit the power to execute contracts in that second section to the amount of revenue and taxes.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir, I do not; for that would not be sufficient.

Mr. MORTON. Then how does the circumstance of executing contracts by revenue and taxes affect their payment in 3.65 bonds?

Mr. THURMAN. The contractors may be paid in 3.65 bonds. That is what I will come to. I do not wish the Senator to interrupt me.

The 3.65 bonds are provided for in the sixth section, and the provisions are perfectly harmonious. If the Senator had heard me through he would have found that this law is as consistent and harmonious perhaps as any law he ever saw. We limited their power. We have given them power now to use taxes and revenue of the District, yet we knew that would not be sufficient, that that would not enable them to pay the debt. The people could not have stood a taxation that would enable them to pay the debt, and we therefore proposed that in respect to what was called the floating debt of the District there should be power to issue a bond which might be tendered to the public creditor in satisfaction of his claim, leaving to him the option to take it or not. We did not compel him to take it. We only tendered it to him, and left it to him to say whether he would wait until the Government should be in funds from taxes or other sources to pay his claim in fact, or whether he would take present payment in the bonds; and it was not Hobson's choice, either, as has been often said. The creditor had that option; and there are creditors to this day, I am told, who have preferred to wait instead of taking these bonds, as we gave them the option to do. There was a great deal of discussion on the subject of that bond. Some Senators were in favor of making it a bond at 4, others at 4½, and others at 5 per cent. interest. We reported the bill at 3.65. Our reason for doing that was that we had official information before us that the contracts which we supposed, and which we had a right to suppose from the official report of the government of the District to us, remained unexecuted or unpaid for, were contracts that had been let at a price enhanced as high as 25 or 30 per cent. on account of the medium of payment that the contractor expected to receive. He did not expect to receive cash when he took the contract for his work. He expected to receive some of that variety of currency which was issued by the old government called certificates, yellow-back certificates, green-back certificates, and I do not know how many other colored-back certificates, which were floating around here and paid to the contractors, worth but little over sixty and sometimes not so many cents in the dollar. We thought, therefore, after making an estimate of the probable value of a 3.65 bond whose interest should be guaranteed in the manner provided in the sixth or seventh section of the act—I forget which it is—that that bond would be more valuable to the contractor, or at least as valuable as the stuff with which he expected to be paid when he made his contract. We did not force it upon him, but we simply gave him the option to take it or not to take it, as he saw fit.

It will be remembered that the President of the United States, before signing this bill, sent us a message in which he suggested, if my memory is not incorrect, that the rate of interest should be made higher. He had been undoubtedly prevailed on to believe that a 3.65 bond would not be a fair compensation to the contractor, and he therefore sent in a message before signing the bill, calling our attention to that subject. It was an unusual mode of procedure for the Chief Magistrate of the nation, but it struck me then, and strikes me now, as having been a very wise and proper proceeding on his part. So we considered it; so the two Houses considered it. The message was referred to this same committee of investigation, which was a joint committee of the two Houses. We took it up; we made a report upon it unanimously to both Houses of Congress, setting forth the reasons why we preferred a bond at this low rate of interest and why we ought not to accede to the suggestion of the President. More than that, some members of the committee were directed to call upon the President and explain the matter to him, which was done, and he was entirely satisfied and signed the bill.

Then we come to the question, for what purpose were these 3.65 bonds to be issued and what amount was it contemplated would be necessary? In the first place I must say that no Senator has a right to complain of the committee, for we made a full report to the Senate, in which we set forth exactly, according to the testimony and official reports made to us, what was the debt of this District. There never was more pains taken in the world to ascertain what is a public debt than that committee took to ascertain what was the debt of this District. The committee was appointed in February. It met on the 11th day of that month and organized. It appointed a sub-committee to report a plan for conducting the investigation. Two days afterward that sub-committee reported, and in order to make the investigation complete, and to do no injustice to any one, that subcommittee framed a set of interrogatories to be submitted to the then government of the District, to be sent to the governor for his reply. Among the questions propounded were the following:

1. What was the indebtedness of Washington when the present government went into existence, to wit, February 21, 1871, and how was it evidenced? If any part of it was in bonds, when were they issued; for how long a time had they to run; what interest did they bear, and what was their aggregate amount?
2. How much of said indebtedness has been paid; when paid; and out of what revenues or funds? and if any acts of the District Legislature have been passed in relation thereto, give a reference to the same.
3. Same inquiries in relation to Georgetown.
4. Same in relation to that portion of the District not included in Washington or Georgetown.
5. What is the present indebtedness of Washington, and how evidenced?
6. Same question as to Georgetown.
7. Same question as to the territory not included in Washington or Georgetown.
8. What is the present indebtedness of the District, (excluding the above,) id est, the indebtedness of the District government;

That is, what is the present indebtedness of the District, excluding the indebtedness which existed at the time Governor Shepherd's government came into existence?

(a.) How is the same evidenced?
(b.) Describe the bonds or different series of bonds, giving their dates, amounts, time to run, and rate of interest.
(c.) What price was obtained for such bonds when sold, negotiated, or paid to contractors or other creditors of the District government?
(d.) Are any of such bonds yet in the possession of the District government? and, if so, describe them, and give the aggregate amount thereof.
(e.)—

I call the attention of the Senate particularly to this.

(e.) Furnish a balance-sheet, showing the liabilities of the District and the assets which are considered by you as available for meeting the indebtedness of the District.

Then in respect to contracts this question was put:

1. What contracts for improvements have been made by the District government or any department thereof? Give a list of all such contracts; their dates; the names of the contractors; the nature of the work to be done; the prices to be paid therefor; when and in what medium of funds to be paid; and the aggregate cost under each contract, if completed; and how much has been paid under each contract not yet completed, and how much remains to be paid thereon.

Those were some among the questions, searching questions, to find out what was the indebtedness of the District; what was the nature of the indebtedness; what contracts had been entered into by the board of public works of the District; how much had been paid upon them; and what amount remained to be paid. Those, with various other questions, were sent to the governor and time allowed him to make an answer. He took the necessary time and, with the aid of the government officials, returned a very voluminous answer, indeed not more voluminous than was necessary, but an answer that apparently on its face was an answer to all the interrogatories put to the governor. Now, what did he say in respect to the amount of the debt and the amount necessary to complete the contracts which had been entered into? The committee find in respect to this. After collating all that he returned upon it the committee report it to the Senate as follows:

From the best information attainable, the committee find that the following is as nearly as can be stated the debt of the District which is in excess of the $10,000,000 limitation fixed by act of Congress:

Bills payable of the District of Columbia	$410,000 00
Certificates known as auditor's certificates, less amount of assessments authorized to be made	2,454,526 55
Contracts made for work and not completed, two-thirds of which must be paid by the District	883,332 00
Amounting in the aggregate to	3,747,858 55

This is an absolute debt against the District, after exhausting every available resource, near or remote, for its payment, unless a new tax for this purpose shall be levied. It is a debt due and payable at the present. But this is not the whole floating or unfunded liability resting upon the people of this District. The total obligations for which the board of public works and the District are really liable, including such as is accurately ascertained and the remainder estimated, may be stated at $7,683,756.89, made up of the following items:

And then follow the items of that indebtedness:

Certificates known as auditor's	$4,900,886 57
Contracts not yet completed, estimated	1,325,000 00
Damages to property, estimated	500,000 00
Property taken from streets	50,000 00
District of Columbia debt to February 1, 1874	497,870 32
Bills payable	410,000 00
Total	7,683,756 89

The total burden upon the people of the District outside of the present funded debt is, however, much larger. To ascertain that burden approximately there should be added to the foregoing—

Certificates of indebtedness outstanding	$1,450,000
Sewer certificates outstanding	1,030,000
Present obligations of District not included in the above	850,000 or a total in addition of $3,330,000; which must be met by taxation in some form; or a total burden of $11,013,756.89 beyond that represented by the funded debt, which is $9,902,251.18; making a total burden upon the property of the District of $20,916,008.07.

It will be seen that after months of labor and after very full reports from the then government of the District, the committee found that the floating debt of the District (and in that is included not only everything that was not funded debt, but the entire amount estimated by the board of public works to be necessary to complete contracts that were in course of execution) was $11,013,756.89. That we ascertained to be the fact upon the data and testimony printed in these volumes; and I venture to say that no man can look at it and make that debt one dollar more.

This leads me to notice an error into which my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] fell, and also the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] before me, in supposing that the estimate of $1,325,000 to complete unexecuted contracts was only to complete such contracts as the commissioners have executed. No, sir; it was to complete all valid contracts, whether they had been wisely made or unwisely made. It was the estimate in answer to the inquiry of the committee, what sum is necessary to complete the existing contracts? The answer was $1,325,000. Then we provided for the issuing of a 3.65 bond to pay this floating indebtedness. That would require only a little over $11,000,000; but we went further than that. We were told, "If you stop at that point there will be no money to pay for certain improvements which are in course of execution, and which will become perhaps a dead loss to the people if they are not preserved and completed." They were not the streets—work on the streets had almost ceased—but they were the great sewers, especially that great sewer which was to come down the Tiber, and another sewer which was to run into the old canal, and another sewer that went to the Eastern Branch. We went and examined those sewers ourselves. We saw the work that was being done upon them. We saw that unless something was provided for their preservation all the work that had been done and the money that had been paid upon them would be lost. They were incomplete sewers, and an incomplete sewer is worse than no sewer at all. That was the state of affairs that we saw. Besides that, we saw that the contractors had gone on to execute that work, and, so far as we could see, had gone on in good faith. It is true that there was some evidence tending to show that some of the work done on other sewers, which had been received and paid for, had not been well done; but I believe there was no evidence at all as to these sewers in process of construction that the contractors had not performed their duty. We saw that unless some mode was provided to enable that work to be preserved and completed, those contractors would all be ruined men, without any fault whatsoever of theirs; ruined because we should have put an end to a contract without any default on their part. Therefore it was that we put into the sixth section of the bill the provision that has been referred to so often. Among the certificates to be audited are:

Thirdly, the debt evidenced by the certificates of the auditor and the comptroller of the District of Columbia; fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works; fifthly, claims for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by or on behalf of the District of Columbia.

Here was the District of Columbia, through its Legislature, creating indebtedness, and the board of public works also creating ten times or twenty times as much indebtedness. We therefore provided for those cases for the reason that I have suggested. As to the indebtedness to be created to satisfy contracts made by the District of Columbia, the statement made by the board of public works, it hardly need be said, amounted to a trifling sum. As to the amount necessary to be expended to complete the contracts made by the board of public works, we had the solemn assurance of that board that it would only be $1,325,000; and therefore we did suppose that under no conceivable state of the case could these 3.65 bonds much exceed the sum of $12,000,000. That was said. Now I am told that the amount issued is fourteen million nine hundred and odd thousand dollars; in round numbers, nearly $15,000,000. I am not blaming the present board of commissioners, because I do not know that they are to blame, and I will not blame men without knowing that they are at fault; but if they are not to blame, if they have not exceeded the law, if they have not gone beyond it at all, but have only executed this law, then that committee and Congress were grossly imposed upon by the late government of the District. That is the fact about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my colleague whether he does not know that the amount stated by the old District government was not sufficient to carry out its contracts?

Mr. THURMAN. I really do not comprehend my colleague.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the matter correctly, the governor of the District assured the committee that the amount necessary to complete the contracts was about $1,300,000. One year ago Congress and the committee were distinctly informed that, from estimates already made, the amount reached nearly two million dollars. Undoubtedly Governor Shepherd did what my colleague and the committee said, underestimated the amount required to carry into execution these contracts. From the nature of the contracts themselves this would easily happen in regard to such improvements. He had to stipulate for the improvement of the streets, fix the price of paving and grading, and all that sort of thing; and unless you know from the estimates of engineers the number of yards of excavation, the number of yards of paving, &c., it is impossible to give a correct estimate. Therefore the governor may have been honest, and really believed that the amount necessary to complete these contracts was so much, and it yet turn out not to be sufficient. Who is to be blamed for that? The fact simply is that the work costs more than it was supposed it would cost; and I will say here that, if every person who has estimated the cost of public improvements should be held strictly to the figures and made responsible, the public officers of the United States of America would be very much more severely criticised. I remember when I was a lad that the Muskingum improvement, that famous improvement in my State, was estimated to cost $1,000,000, and it cost three millions before we got through with it. I do not know that there is any man who makes an estimate on a new house but will find in the end that he is mistaken in regard to it. My colleague will see that it was impossible in the nature of things to estimate the cost of these improvements in the District accurately. The committee were mistaken as to the cost of them; the commissioners themselves were mistaken as to the cost of them. No doubt Governor Shepherd was mistaken as to the cost of them when they came to be executed according to certain specifications.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator now on the floor whether he supposed that, under the power of the commissioners to complete the legal obligations of the previous board, they had the power to take up the case of a street already done and reconstruct it; or, still further, that if the law had designated an improvement between two streets they could extend that under the power conferred on them?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already fairly stated that point, in my judgment, but I do not know that the Senator was present. I will state a case, and if I am misinformed I shall be glad to be corrected. An important street of this city had been so badly paved that within the time fixed during which the contractors were to keep it in repair it became practically in such a condition that it had to be torn up. It was a bad job of work. The commissioners had the right by the terms of the contract, which were legalized and which they had a right to enforce, to require the contractor to repair that work, or, in case the contractor neglected to do it upon notice, the commissioners had the right to do it. The notice was given and the contractors refused to repair it. Then the commissioners undertook to repair it, and they used all the material on that road that was available for the purpose to repair portions of it, and then on the other portions of it included in the contract they put down cheaper but better material. That is all there is of it. If they had gone on and put down a wood pavement, renewed it in any form whatever, it would have cost more than the material they used; but instead of that they used a cheaper and better material to repair a road which they had a right to have repaired. Now, I think that is the whole sum and substance of any allegation I have heard made that these gentlemen exceeded their authority. There may have been some other cases, but I do not know of any of them.

In regard to the class of improvements in connection with the sewers, I will state that it is true that, in the final completion of the sewers, they had to extend them beyond what was supposed to be necessary at the time the former examination was made, and they claimed that they had a right, under the general authority conferred by the first section of the act and the authority conferred also by the sixth section, to protect and preserve these large and extensive sewers by constructing suitable outlets and also suitable ways into the sewers; otherwise they would have been exposed to ruin and decay; and they conceived that they had the right, for the preservation and protection of these works, to extend guards and outlets and inlets.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether these commissioners, in taking up these defective pavements and putting down others, did it in order to hold the contractors liable on their contracts?

Mr. SHERMAN. They gave notice to the contractors to do it, as they claim, and, as I understand, have sued on the bonds.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There was such provision in the contracts?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And limited to a specified time?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. I read the contract a while ago. The contract expressly provides that, in case the contractors do not keep them in repair, they shall be compelled within a certain time to repair them, and, if they do not repair them, the Government shall repair them at their expense, and the contractors give bonds to secure that stipulation. As that stipulation is not to be performed until some years after the contract is completed and the money is paid over to them on the completion of the contract, they give bonds for the completion of the contract, and these bonds were in existence and came into the hands of the commissioners with these contracts and with these powers.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then part of this money is to be recovered back on those bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly; and, as I understand, they have suits pending.

Mr. MORTON. Is there not a law which gives power to repair the streets anyhow?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly. The Senator from Indiana was not in when I read the first section. The first section gives these commissioners all the powers conferred on the old District government and also on the board of public works, excepting certain powers which are defined, and even under these exceptions they have the right to make repairs.

Mr. THURMAN. I never object to have two or three speeches interjected into one of mine, and therefore I do not complain of the interruptions, although I did want to make a statement on this subject with some connection. I must answer the inquiry of my colleague. He asked me if I did not know that the estimate made by the former government of the amount necessary to be paid to complete the then uncompleted works which were in process of construction, was an underestimate? When he asks me if I do not know it, I must answer him that I do not know it. I know that it is so reported by the present commissioners, as I have heard it said here in this debate; but which is the correct statement, that of the old government or that of the existing government, it is not for me to decide without having investigated the subject. I want to do injustice to no man, and I shall not, therefore, undertake to assume, without having even read the report of the present commissioners, that the former estimate was an inaccurate estimate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will indulge me one moment I will bring this matter to a distinct issue. Even if it should turn out as my colleague fears, that the amount expended to complete these works is larger than the sum estimated, I ask whether that was the fault of the commissioners or the fault of the board of audit? These commissioners never claimed to do anything except to execute existing contracts. They did not claim the power to make contracts for new work, except to protect and preserve the sewers that needed it. All the money they expended was under contracts previously made. Now, I will ask my colleague whether, if there has been any fault or error of law in the construction of these contracts and the extent of them, that is not the fault of the board of audit rather than of the board of commissioners?

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to put a question. Suppose that something occurring in the last two years has made an improvement of streets necessary, which was not necessary two years ago, requiring a new pavement where there was none and where there was none contracted for, has this board the power under that law to go on and make that new improvement?

Mr. THURMAN. If I am to answer all the questions that can be put to me in regard to anything that can be conceived of in this District of Columbia, I shall never get through with what I wanted to say. My colleague asks me who is to blame if the estimate was too low; whether the blame does not rather fall on the board of audit than on the present commissioners? I say it does not fall on either of them. If that is the truth of the case, it only falls on the men who made that wrong estimate to us.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask a question, and I should be glad to have the Senator's opinion on one point, whether or not he construes the act under consideration to justify, by fair construction, the board of commissioners in executing any and all contracts that had previously been made by the board of public works; because I think that is one question which was involved in this discussion, whether these commissioners are bound under this law to execute all contracts made by the board of public works, whether they were partially executed or otherwise.

Mr. THURMAN. I prefer to go on with what I was proceeding to say, and then I will try, if I can recollect, to answer the various questions that have been put to me.

I commenced by saying that I was not standing here to criticise this man or that man, but simply to explain, as well as I am able to do, what is this law and the circumstances under which it was enacted, and to show that the law itself was as wise a law as we could enact under those circumstances; and I must beg the attention of the Senate to the fact that this was a mere temporary law; the government that was provided by this law was a mere temporary government. It was so at least contemplated, for this very act itself provided for the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses to frame a government of a permanent character, and one, too, which should provide what should be the proportion of expenditure in this District that ought to be borne by the General Government. I think my friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] has heard of such a provision in the law as that. I think he brought in here a very voluminous document framed for a permanent government of this District, which met the fate that many other of the labors of the human intellect have met, of something nearly akin—I will not use the word I was going to use—but something that actually amounts to neglect. That work died, and so this temporary government remained. This law, which it was supposed would exist only for about a year—for it was passed in June—provided for a joint committee to meet in the vacation to frame a law for the permanent government of the District and to report it to Congress at the commencement of the next session. It was supposed then it would pass, and the next session would end on the 4th of March last; so that at the very outside it was supposed that the temporary government provided for by this act would only have a duration of about nine months. That was the idea. It was thought Congress had wisdom enough to frame a law for the permanent government of the District; that, if they could not adopt the law provided by this committee and reported by my friend from Maine, then they had wit enough of their own to frame a law, with the aid at least of the labors of that committee; and therefore this act was only for a duration of nine months. That was all that was contemplated. But my friend from Maine, when he reported his bill, awaked great alarm in the mind of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] He saw in it an attack on the inestimable right of suffrage; he saw in it an attack upon a certain portion of our fellow-citizens "on account of race, color, and previous condition of servitude," and he thundered away at the bill of my friend from Maine until he quite knocked the breath out of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He had some help.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, he did have some help, for in the bill there was an attack on good liquor, [laughter,] and that aroused the ire of my friend from Delaware, and he attacked the bill.

Mr. MORTON. That injured the democratic party. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, that injured the democratic party.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Undoubtedly there was a great deal of invitation to morality in that bill.

Mr. THURMAN. It was entirely too moral for this Senate. [Laughter.] That is perfectly clear; and so it fell. But you must not blame the committee of investigation, that brought in a little bill to last nine months, that our friend the Senator from Maine with his joint committee, sitting in Washington and sitting in Saratoga, was not able to frame a permanent government for the District of Columbia. Not all the waters of the Hathorn Spring and all the good wine that might be mingled with it could bring forth any offspring that would receive the assent of the Senate of the United States.

I have said that I do not know how it comes that instead of $1,300,000 being all that is necessary to complete the contracts it turns out that four or five million dollars, if I am right, are necessary; for it will be remembered that in the eleven million and odd dollars which we estimated to be the floating indebtedness of the District——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator wants to be accurate. The limit was $12,000,000, according to the estimate.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator must bear in mind that I was just saying that in the $12,000,000 which we estimated to be the outside of these 3.65 certificates is included the $1,300,000 that would complete the existing contracts.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So I understood.

Mr. THURMAN. Take that from the $12,000,000 and you have only $10,700,000 as the then floating debt of the District. Now, take $10,700,000 from $15,000,000, and you have over $4,000,000 expended beyond the amount, but only $3,000,000 I agree according to the estimate. The Senator is right about that.

Now a word in answer to what was said by my colleague and also by the Senator from California about the nature of the estimates. Certainly we need not be told that estimates are generally under the mark; but there is this peculiarity about that matter. When anybody wants to get the Government into the construction of an improvement, or the building of a house or public structure of any kind, before the work has been undertaken at all or even ordered, nothing is more common than to have estimates that are far short; but that is one state of the case. An estimate made after more than two-thirds of the work is done as to what will be necessary to complete it is a wholly different thing. An estimate made after the work is ordered and is under contract is a wholly different thing, and there is no justification whatever for any gross error in such an estimate as that. Here was this work; it had to be surveyed, planned, platted, and estimated before anything whatsoever could be done upon it according to the law. There was no authority to put a spade in the ground until it had been planned, estimated, and approved; and here was the work two-thirds of it or more done. There, I say, was no justification then for an erroneous estimate as to what was necessary for the completion of that work; at least I have seen none whatsoever. And therefore I say that prima facie, if the present commissioners have lived within the law, if they have not exceeded the powers vested in them by the law, it follows as a matter of course that we were grossly deceived by the estimates upon which we acted and in virtue of which we passed this law. If, on the other hand, the present commissioners have exceeded their authority, then the fault lies with them, and not with the old government. Which is the truth I am not well enough informed to say.

One word as to this guarantee, and then I will relieve the Senate from any further observations of mine. This guarantee is as plain as words can make it. It was maturely considered, and was a subject of much debate in the committee that reported it. There were Senators who thought it ought to be an absolute guarantee on the part of the Government to pay the interest and also the principal, and all the contractors were clamorous for such a guarantee. The committee would not yield. It would only make a qualified guarantee, and that guarantee was in these words:

> And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

This act contemplated that the General Government should pay a proportional part of the expenses of government within this District, and that proportional part it was supposed would be ascertained by the joint committee that was to frame a permanent form of government for the District; and here is a pledge that the Government of the United States will pay that proportional part. What it should be was not determined by this act; it was to be the subject of investigation; but whenever found, here is the pledge that the Government would, by payments out of the public Treasury of its proportional part of the expenses of government in this District, contribute to pay the interest on these 3.65 bonds and provide a sinking fund for the liquidation of the principal. Then the further provision is a pledge that Congress would levy taxes sufficient to make up what was necessary after the application of the proportional part of the Government. That was the pledge. That is all the pledge there was. It was not a pledge to pay the whole interest out of the public Treasury; it was a pledge that we would pay our proportionate part, but not a pledge that out of the Treasury of the United States we would pay the whole interest on these bonds or provide this sinking fund. In the message to which I have alluded, the special message sent by the President to Congress calling our attention to the low rate of interest on these bonds, he spoke of the bonds as guaranteed by the United States; and because of his speaking in that message of the bonds as guaranteed, as if it were an absolute guarantee of the United States, the committee to whom that message was referred in reporting upon the message not only reported in respect to the rate of interest, 3.65 per cent., but also took care to repeat the guarantee in the very words of the bill which had then passed and been sent to the President for his approval, so that there might be no mistake what that guarantee was; and the guarantee remains the same to this day.

What then is necessary for us in order to the fulfillment of this pledge? Two things are necessary. One is that we shall pay our proportionate share of the expense of this District. Congress has never determined what that is. It ought to be determined. It ought to be definitely determined; it ought to be known, because unless you do know it you cannot regulate the amount of taxation to be imposed upon the people of this District. But Congress has neglected that duty.

Now, sir, the first thing for us to do on the subject of this District—I do not say before the consideration of this resolution, because that might prevent the resolution from passing in time—is to declare what shall be the proportion of expense of government within this District which shall be paid out of the Federal Treasury, and then you know what proportion shall be paid by the people of this District; then you know the amount to levy upon them. These are the two things which it is necessary for us to do: first to determine what proportion of the debt of the District the General Government will pay, and in the second place to levy upon the people of this District an amount of taxes which, with the amount contributed by the General Government, will pay this interast and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal of the debt.

Now, Mr. President, in respect to the immediate resolution which is before the Senate, I am, as at present advised, against the amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations. I prefer the resolution as it came from the House. I think that there ought to be an end to the issue of these 3.65 bonds, at least until we are better advised. I think we ought not to allow this issue to be going on blindfold. It is creating a debt that will be terrible some time. These bonds now, I suppose, are worth not more than sixty-five or seventy cents on the dollar at the outside. We, then, are expending them and getting for every dollar provided for in these bonds only seventy cents' worth of work or material, and I do not know but that seventy cents is too high. I wish some one would tell me what they are selling for; but assuming that we are getting but seventy cents' worth of work or material for every dollar of these bonds, we shall have to pay one hundred cents for every dollar. We cannot pay in seventy cents; we shall have ultimately to pay one hundred cents; so that the shave on these bonds is prodigious. It is borrowing money at a frightful rate of interest, although they bear only an interest of 3.65 per cent., when the discount on them is thirty-odd per cent. And therefore it was that, while these bonds might well enough be used to pay indebtedness that already existed and which they paid dollar for dollar, while every dollar of the bonds extinguished an equal amount of indebtedness, yet in respect to new work, if paid for by these bonds, you are hawking the credit of this District around at a discount of more than 30 per cent.; and that is bad financiering, in my judgment. I am, therefore, as at present advised, in favor of the resolution as it came from the House, unless there can be some explanation——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask the Senator whether he does not observe and recognize the distinction between the propositions contained in the two provisos: First, "that any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited." Now, as a matter of fact, the board of audit have audited, to be carried into bonds, certificates to the extent of $914,540.05, and there are claims before the board amounting to the sum of $510,602.04.

Mr. THURMAN. That goes to make up the $14,900,000?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir. But these certificates are not in bonds. The process is that the board of audit has audited that amount; it is in certificates. Now the ministerial business of converting them into bonds remains.

Mr. THURMAN. I was not aware of that state of facts.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. For that reason the committee nonconcurred in that portion of the proviso.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I should think that the committee had better have reported in lieu of it a provision that the amount of bonds should not exceed $15,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The proposition is pending.

Mr. SARGENT. I want to modify it still further, and I hope the Senator will allow my modification to be read.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection to allowing it to be read, for I believe I have about concluded all I have to say.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer this as a modification of my former amendment:

Provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 bonds, and those which have not been so converted and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000; and when the limit herein provided for shall be reached, the board of audit shall be, and is, abolished, and all the powers conferred upon that board shall cease and determine, and all the papers and public property in their possession shall be delivered to the commissioners of the District or their successors.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if the business of Government rests on the principles which govern the business of mankind at large, I cannot doubt that this is an extraordinary proceeding. When I speak of "an extraordinary proceeding," I mean to include all that has passed on this subject in the way of legislative consideration since that time when it was ascertained that a debt existed in this District which, in some form or other, by, or by the authority of, the United States was to be satisfied. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] in concluding his remarks reminded us of the fact, for it is a fact, that the credit of the Government has been hawked about and discounted at a ruinous rate. How comes that; and what contribution does the Senate make to-day toward the appreciation or depreciation of that credit? It turned out some time ago—I do not stop to name the exact date—that in this city and in this District, with the government of which, by the Constitution of the United States Congress is chargeable and charged, it had come about that a large amount of indebtedness existed which was to be liquidated and satisfied either by tax and tribute taken off the property in the District after the manner of such things in the States or in some other mode, or by some appropriation or provision made by Congress. A committee and the two Houses, wisely I doubt not, hit upon the plan of issuing an evidence of debt, for which and behind which the United States was to stand responsible; and I do not stop to haggle about terms or closely to inspect words whether they be in one form or another; but I say that the design, the intention was to issue bonds bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, which should not be bonds good because nobody was behind them, anonymous securities, charging somebody, those to whom they were offered knew not who, but bonds which were to be made good in substance and effect by the United States. Does not everybody know that?

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the Senator precisely in his statement; but I would desire to call his attention to what was stated in the House of Representatives by the gentleman who reported the bill, and of whom inquiry was made.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is there anything in the bill which commits Congress to the indorsement or the payment of the District debt?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. No, sir; I will call attention to that point in a few moments. I think I can show that the committee has been careful about that.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend from Massachusetts calls my attention to that which does not challenge or impeach the line of remark in which I was engaged, but that which I meant to cite to support the next allegation which I was about to make. I was in the act of saying that the intention being to issue evidences of debt which should be valuable and acceptable because the United States in some form was to stand by them, care was taken then, as care seems to be taken now, to give those securities a black eye in short, in the language of the street.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very glad the Senator called my attention to the precise form in which this took place in one instance. The same thing in substance occurred here. It was a sort of proceeding by which we did it, and yet by which in the same breath we denied pro tanto that we did it. What was the result? Does any man suppose that in the money markets of the world, or the money markets here, a bond of the United States upon time, bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, was only worth seventy cents to men whose money was seeking investment? No, sir; we all know better than that.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It ought to be worth eighty on computation.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend reminds me that on computation it was worth over eighty, and the computation was a simple one to be made. Every man who has money to invest can ascertain precisely, if he pays eighty cents for a security which bears 3.65 interest at par, what is the net interest on the payment he makes. Eighty cents the honorable Senator says is its value. Very well; it has been 10 per cent. lower than that, and the Senator from Ohio says it is so now. Sixty-nine I am told these securities are now. Worse and worse!

Mr. President, how came this? It came because in the language of the law we left a peg on which to hang a doubt, and then we called attention to that doubt and gave substance to it by just such statements as that to which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has called attention; and I remember seeing in a newspaper that a law officer or the acting law officer of a State had given an opinion, an opinion sought by those who, in the money market were handling these securities, that in truth and in fact the Government of the United States was not chargeable at all.

I pass over the interval and come to what has occurred now as illustrating it still further. Here comes a bill to us from the other House, which files a caveat carefully against any confidence which might come to exist touching these bonds—a bill which says to everybody, "Take care; do not be too free in investing your money in them; be careful how you pay more than sixty-nine and a half, or you may get caught; because the bill says:

And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

We all know that if you could point out which of the bonds, if any, have not been issued in pursuance of law, and merely follow those particular bonds, and taboo them, and depreciate them, and cast no doubt upon all the rest and residue of the issue, it would be comparatively a very harmless provision; but the effect of it, I submit, is to asperse indiscriminately these bonds, and to continue to keep them depressed. The Senator from Ohio says that it is obvious to everybody who thinks that although those bonds are paid out at par to contractors, and stopping there you might say, "Very well; nobody suffers but the contractor; if he gets a security which is worth only 70 per cent. it is his loss; it does not cost the Government anything;" yet he cuts his coat according to his cloth; and when he makes his contract, knowing that he is to receive his compensation in depreciated securities, he adds so much to the price; and therefore you add to the cost of work in the first instance; and then comes, as the Senator from Ohio says, the continual hawking about of depreciated securities, for which in truth and in fact the design was that the Government should be responsible in some form, and which were so put upon the market and emitted, although, as the Senator from Massachusetts reminds us, there was a disposition all the time, using a vulgar phrase, to blow and keep the flour in our mouth, to do it with bated breath, to have a sort of qualification and mental reservation about the thing which would startle everybody and startle everything, and especially that most timid of all things, known as capital.

Here comes a bill, and a debate springs up of what nature and for what purpose? When I hear my honorable friend from Iowa make a statement or make an allegation, I know right well that he is not moved to it by any impulse which is not creditable; I know right well that he does not do it without believing, and considerately believing, that it is well founded. But my honorable friend from Iowa rises and makes general declarations to show that the gentlemen who have been acting as commissioners of the District of Columbia have overstepped their authority, have broken through the cobwebs of the law, and stalked very free and uncontrolled, according to his statement, wherever their will might lead them in the exercise of a somewhat unbridled discretion.

Now, Mr. President, having looked at these statutes with some care, and listened as I might to the advice we have received, I am bound to say that I see no reason whatever for the strictures made by the honorable Senator from Iowa. If I were put upon ingenuity to find a justification, I should be compelled to find it in one word in this statute, which word I believe is a mistake—I should be compelled to find it in the fact that in one case the word "and" is employed when I think very obviously the design was to employ the word "or;" and I am told that every lawyer to whom this statute has been submitted for construction has been of that opinion. Indeed, I am told that there is a concurrence of construction in that respect, nobody insisting that the commissioners were bound to read the clause to which I refer as if it were a cumulative clause requiring that the obligations they assumed or the contracts they made should have all the elements named in that provision, in place of some one of those elements, as I think the design in the enumeration was.

The honorable Senator from Ohio says that some preceding government made a statement that eight million and odd dollars was the total expenditure, the outside I think he said, of everything that could be for work already done; "and yet," he said, "here come in I do not know how many millions more." Well, Mr. President, I am told that the fact is that the investigating committee ascertained, as they thought, on the 20th of June, 1874, that $8,305,000, rejecting some odd units making a fraction, was the amount which might become due or would become due for which certificates were to issue and audits to be made for work already done. When the board of audit, set up by the committee and by this act, came, not by conjecture or speculation or guessing how it would be at some other time ahead, to ascertain by actual evidence of arithmetic how much it was in fact at that time, they found that in place of being eight million it was over ten million dollars. Is anybody to blame for that? Suppose somebody is to blame for it, is that any reason why upon the question of paying the interest which is about to fall due on the 1st of February all manner of people should be arraigned and all manner of inquiry started as to whether anybody has been regular or irregular in his proceedings? If these bonds are held by persons entitled to receive the interest upon them, and if the Government of the United States is bound in honor and good faith to make provision for that interest, what difference does it make whether Governor Shepherd or some other man who three years ago was asked to guess or estimate the amount of the demands overshot the mark two million or fell short of the mark two million? What of it?

But, turning again to what was said by the Senator from Iowa, the allegation is that these gentlemen have gone on and made contracts which they had no business to make. Now, I am told as matter of fact that they have made no contracts for new work; that if there be an exception to that, it is that doubtful case which might fall on one side or the other side of the line, depending upon the construction which Senators may give to it—that one case of a contract in respect of which they said the contractors were in default, having badly done a job of work in the paving of a street, and under the right given them by the contract they proceeded to make it good, but in place of relaying blocks which had once been eaten by the tooth of time in a single year, they used asphalt or concrete or whatever may be the description by which it is known, being at once a more permanent and a cheaper paving material. That I am told is the truth about new contracts.

But the Senator said that they assumed obligations, which obligations were entered into by the board of public works, and that they are derelict in that; and he aimed a sharp-pointed question at the Senator from Ohio to find out whether he thought that they had a right to assume all the contracts made by the board of public works. Now, I ask the attention of my friend especially because he was not only of the committee, but, if I mistake not, chairman of the committee, the chief guardian of this District on the occasion when all this subject was illuminated by the light that was poured upon it, to the fact that on the 7th of December, 1874, a year and something more ago, these gentlemen, under the requirement of one of the sections of this act so much commented upon, submitted to the President of the United States, and the President to Congress, an account of their stewardship, minute and careful, and that in that report they apprised the honorable Senator from Iowa, because they spoke to him not only inclusively but specially, he being so largely instructed on this subject, that "ninety-nine contracts have been so resumed;" that is, ninety-nine contracts which had been entered into by the board of public works, in respect of which the interruption that we all know had taken place, "have been so resumed. Of these, eighteen are completed and have received final measurement, and upon the remainder work is progressing. Final measurements have also been made upon twenty contracts which were completed under the late board of public works, but which did not reach a final measurement."

I ask in all fairness, speaking of three gentlemen who have been truly described as strangers, men of character, called to undertake a distasteful trusteeship, whether, when they themselves specifically reported fourteen months ago (because the report was dated in November) that they understood their obligations and the directions of the law bearing upon them to be that they were to go on, resume, recognize, complete these contracts which, made by their predecessors, had been suspended, they did not summon the honorable Senator to his feet? Why did he not rise then and read this second section and show its narrowness as compared with the amplitude of the construction which they ascribed to it? On the contrary, as I am told, in neither House of Congress, in no committee, in no seat of executive or legislative authority did anybody criticise their work or amend their law. Everybody was acquiescent. A report came in a year afterward repeating the same statement touching other contracts, amounting to one hundred and sixty-three in all, all appearing restated in the report which followed this to which I have referred. No objection is made, no criticism; but when a bill comes in to pay interest to bona fide holders, for which the faith, the honor of the United States is pledged, then my honorable friend rises and, taking up this act, he puts on his spectacles and he reads, I think, somewhat between the lines to ascertain that this whole thing has been ultra vires, utterly unauthorized by these three gentlemen who have been acting, not only upon their own characters and consciences, but acting, I am told, from step to step under the advice of counsel.

The honorable Senator from Iowa has read a small sliver of a clause of this act two or three times; not a sentence; not any substantive part of a sentence; and having read it, taking that as the measure of authority of these men, he proceeds to try them by it. Let me read this clause to my honorable friend. In the first place the authority is given to the effect read by the Senator from Ohio, and then follows a limitation, not, as I should submit to him if he were here, of the kind he stated to the Senate, not a limitation as to the power of these men to apply taxes or other revenue, but the limitation is in these words: "But said commission, in the exercise of such power or authority," thereby meaning, as I understand, all the power and authority which is enumerated before, and not merely one power touching taxes, "shall make no contract nor incur any obligation."

And I might stop here to call the attention of lawyers to the fact that the precise and minute phraseology of this section was not very carefully considered, as a word which has occurred already will sufficiently indicate.

But said commission, in the exercise of such power or authority, shall make no contract, nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts—

And I read that putting the interpretation in as if after "District" the word "or" occurred; so that it would read:

To the faithful administration of valid laws enacted for the government of said District, or to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation—

There again I should read "or," as I am told everybody has done who has been called upon to construe this section—or to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act.

As I intimated once before, if the section is to be read as a cumulative section, as a section requiring that in every contract that these men might recognize every one of these elements should be present; that it should not only be a contract of one of the kinds described here, but of all the kinds enumerated, I am not prepared to say that it cannot be shown upon this allegation that these gentlemen have been sailing very near the wind in what they have done. But if you assume, as I think it quite obvious from the language here the design was, to enumerate certain specific kinds of contracts and provide that those which they might recognize should be some one of these kinds, then I cannot understand why it is that if 3.65 bonds have been issued to contractors in the case of contracts made by the board of public works and resumed by the present commissioners and completed—if that be the case I cannot understand in what respect this statute has been violated. But to see more conclusively whether it has been or not I turn over to the sixth section which creates a board of audit consisting of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury, and authorizes them and others to do two or three things which I will enumerate before reading the section. In the first place they are to examine and audit the class of demands that I am going to read; they are to tabulate them; they are to certify them; and then the sinking-fund commissioners of the District are to issue 3.65 bonds for everything that they audit, and now let me see what it is that they are to audit.

All the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia and of the board of public works hereinafter specified, namely: First, the debt evidenced by sewer certificates; secondly, the debt purporting to be evidenced and ascertained by certificate of the auditor of the board of public works; thirdly, the debt evidenced by the certificates of the auditor and the comptroller of the District of Columbia; fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts—written or oral, made by the board of public works.

All indebtedness arising out of contracts, whether written or oral, made by the board of public works. That is very broad, and I infer that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who is overlooking the statute was somewhat surprised in hearing it read, and, running his eye over it, to find it is so broad as it turns out to be. I confess I was when this law was brought to me on this occasion, the first time for a great many months. I was surprised to see that it was so very inclusive in its terms.

Fifthly, claims, for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by or in behalf of the District of Columbia.

The honorable Senator from Ohio distinguished between what the Legislature must do and what the board of public works might do. Here, as I understand these two provisions together, one covers whatever the board of public works did that was a binding contract, and the other covers whatever anybody did which bound the District of Columbia, whether the board of public works, or the Legislature, or anybody else, coming within the sphere of his authority so that he could bind the District. Now, is there any doubt that if contracts were made by the board of public works which were executed, this board had a right to audit them, and that having audited those contracts, the sinking-fund commissioners properly issued 3.65 bonds? Is there any more doubt that if the District commissioners, under the authority given in the act, resumed—to use the word that I see they have employed in their report—contracts which had been previously made and were found to be subsisting, but upon which the proceeding that took place at the time I have referred to had checked the advancement of the work—is there any doubt that if the commissioners found such contracts, and recognized them in the language of the law, and they were executed, the board of audit acted properly in auditing those claims, and the commissioners of the sinking fund in issuing 3.65 bonds for them? And if they were contracts, as every one of them, I repeat, according to my information was, described in that statute, because made by the board of public works, and therefore not new, but already existing and unfinished contracts, where is the criticism to be made upon the action of these gentlemen, acting as they do, with all the presumptions in their favor, arising not only because public officers will be supposed to have done their duty until the contrary appears, but owing to the fact that they are men known to the great body of the Senate, and so known that something more than an unfounded suspicion would be necessary to raise a doubt as to the integrity of their conduct?

Mr. President, I have said so much upon what I humbly conceive to be the foreign portions of this debate, because, first, I felt that injustice had been done to the members of this board of commissioners; second, because I wished to enter my protest against making this the occasion of drawing into still further question, depreciating with still further doubt, any class of securities which have been issued by the United States, and for the whole or any part of which the United States is in honor bound to make provision. No part of this argument on any side, carried to its utmost extent, casts a doubt upon the right of these creditors to receive their interest. No suggestion made relieves, even by the weight of a feather, the obligation which rests on us to provide for the interest. All beyond that question, it seems to me, belongs appropriately to some other time and to some other measure. But as it is presented now, and consideration insisted upon now, I am bound to say that, so far as I have been able to look into these statutes and to understand the facts, there is no reason at all, up to this time, to asperse or to suspect the character or the administration of the members of the board of commissioners.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, in continuation of the last words which fell from the Senator from New York, I desire to say that in any criticism which I may feel it necessary to make upon what has been done in the past, I heartily agree with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) If the Senator from Massachusetts will suspend, the Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

DEATH OF HON. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER.

Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to deliver to the Senate the proceedings of that body upon the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, lately a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Connecticut.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. DAWES. I yield.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask that the resolutions of the House of Representatives be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 28, 1876.

Resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker of the House to take order for superintending the funeral of Hon. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, late a member of this body from the State of Connecticut:

Resolved, That as a mark of the respect entertained by the House for the memory of Hon. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, his remains be removed to Norwich, Connecticut, in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms and attended by the said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these proceedings to the Senate.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. President, in view of the sad intelligence just received from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of one of my distinguished colleagues, Hon. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, a member of that body, and as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 28, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as a Select Committee on the Real Estate Pool and Jay Cooke's Indebtedness the following members: JOHN M. GLOVER of Missouri, JEPTHA D. NEW of Indiana, BURWELL B. LEWIS of Alabama, HENRY O. PRATT of Iowa, and A. HERR SMITH of Pennsylvania.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to the following gentlemen: To Mr. WILLIAMS of New York, until Tuesday next; to Mr. JONES of New Hampshire, for four days; to Mr. TEESE of New Jersey, until Tuesday next; to Mr. CLYMER of Pennsylvania, indefinitely; to Mr. COLLINS of Pennsylvania, for a few days from to-day, and to Mr. JAMES B. REILLY, for a few days from to-day.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. GOODIN to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of the claims of George A. Schreiner and Newell & Huffaner.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Mary Paige.

Mr. G. A. BAGLEY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the memorial and papers in the case of Theophile Bruger and John Goeway, of Sioux City, Iowa.

Mr. MAISH asked leave to withdraw from the files of the House bill H. R. No. 1396.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not of the opinion that that request should be granted.

Mr. MAISH. Very well, Mr. Speaker; it is not material.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask that by unanimous consent the House order a session to-morrow for debate only as in Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. PAGE. I object. [Subsequently.] At the request of several friends I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, and Mr. MAGOON objected.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HALE said: I think the objection made upon this side to a session of the House to-morrow for debate only will be withdrawn, and that if the proposition is renewed it will now be consented to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again ask if there is objection to a session of the House to-morrow for debate only as in Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. ELKINS, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, asking the passage of an enabling act to admit that Territory into the Union as a State; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

POWERS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. GOODIN. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the concurrent resolutions I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House, (the Senate concurring,) That the people of the United States constitute a nation in the sense, to the extent, and for the purposes defined in the Federal Constitution.
